"Speaking of curious accidents by which persons lose their lives, the man who fell out of bed and broke his neck, while presenting an extraordinary case in some respects, will scarcely attract more than passing notice," said a thoughtful man, "for there have been many cases equally remarkable. Men are frequently killed by very slight falls. I recall one case where a man's neck was broken by a very slight turn of his foot. He attempted to 'catch himself,' that is, to preserve his balance, and the effort was of such violence that he broke his neck. Many men have broken their necks by a sudden stumble and a fall on the sidewalk, or by being knocked down by some hurrying pedestrian, or by a street car or a vehicle of some sort. It is not at all uncommon for a policeman, with no intention of doing more than to subdue an unruly member, to break an offender's neck by ramming him over the head with his club. Sometimes the fall which follows, and sometimes the blow, breaks the neck of the offender. Sometimes a sudden violent motion of the head, a quick jerking motion, the kind we make when dodging, will break the neck. I recall an amusing case where a man threw his neck out of joint, without breaking it, by turning his head to one side in an effort to dodge a bullet fired at him at short range. The bullet passed through the rim of his hat. Even after that he carried his head tilted over the right shoulder, and was perfectly able to straighten it. The neck is easily broken, as a matter of fact, and the wonder to me is that more men are not killed in this way now, when we are kept twisting, dodging, ducking and cutting other more or less violent capers."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Simple Life in Iceland

There are no manufactories in the country. Each home is a factory and every member of the family a hand.

Shoes are made from goat skins. The long stockings worn over these in wading through the sno ware knitted by the women and children, and even the beautiful broadcloth comes smooth and perfect from the hand loom found in every house.

The sweet simplicity of their national costume does away with the necessity of fashion books. Young girls who are about to be married need take no thought as to "wherewithal shall they be clothed." When they array themselves in the wedding garments of their ancestors, two or even three generations remote, they are perfectly up to date in the matter of attire.

This simple life is conducive to a state of high morals, higher probably than in any other part of the world. There is not a drop of liquor manufactured on the island, and for the 78,000 population there is but one policeman. There is neither a jail nor any place of incarceration for criminals; nor yet is there a court in which a high crime could be tried.

The percentage of crime is so small that it does not warrant the expense of keeping up a court. When a criminal trial becomes necessary the offender is taken to Denmark to answer to the law for his misdeeds.

The women are among the most advanced in the world. Their Woman's Political League has a membership of 7,000, and they enjoy more civil rights than the women of almost any other country, having a voice in all elections save that for members of their legislative body.—The Pilgrim.

Downfall of the Mosquito

"Did it ever strike you that a mosquito could become an inebriate?" asked the observer of things. "It hasn't? Well, let me tell you one of my experiences. I was working in New Orleans several years ago with a friend of mine. He was a hard drinker, and whenever you saw him he was literally saturated with booze. He was a clever little fellow, though, and for several months he worked in the same office with me. We did considerable night work. Well, every night Ed would come in drunk as a boiled owl, sit down at his desk and begin to peg away. Whether it was because he was the booze artist in the office, or from some other cause, his desk was a mecca for the mosquitoes. There was one big fellow I noticed particularly. He attracted my attention one evening, when Ed was asleep in his chair, and he (the mosquito) was perched on my friend's nose, drilling away for dear life. Pretty soon he became even drunker than Ed and flew away. He perched on the desk where I was writing and his antics were comical. He had a beautiful load, if you'll pardon the street phrase in's language, and was swaggering over the desk like a chicken with the staggers. Honestly, I couldn't help laughing. I caught the mosquito and pulled off just the tip of his wing, so I would know him again. I saw him again the next and many night thereafter. Ed was the only man in the office he'd bite. If Ed didn't show up the mosquito would perch on his desk, assuming a mournful attitude that was pitiful and laughable in one. That was one mosquito who became an inebriate, and I could tell you of"— but his listeners had hied to the lifesaving station across the street.

Thought Visitor Was "Bum"

The late Rev. Father Thomas J. Scully of Cambridge used to tell of this experience he once had:

While going home from a town where he had delivered a lecture he was the only passenger on a horse car that got stalled, because of a heavy snow storm, in a lonesome locality.

Asking the conductor the location of the nearest house, Father Scully reached it after a weary half-mile walk throgh the snow. Knocking on the door, he asked and was granted the privilege of entering by a kindly faced woman. He did not disclose his identity, but while enjoying the warmth of the stove he asked for something to eat and something hot to drink.

The good woman bustled about, and soon the priest was partaking of her hospitable fare. Tugging at the woman's skirts was a boy some 5 or 6 years old. The priest beamed kindly on him and asked him his name.

The boy began to cry vigorously.

"Shame on ye," cried the woman, "shame on ye, Johnnie."

Still the youngster blubbered.

The priest went on eating. He was decidedly hungry after his long ride in a cold car, and his walk through the snow rather jaded him.

As the boy continued to cry, his mother exclaimed: "Dry up, ye bad little thing; dry up, I say, or the bum will ate ye," and then in an apparent way to the astonished Father Scully, "Won't ye, bum; won't ye ate Johnnie if he don't hush his noise?"

When she learned who the supposed "bum" really was the poor woman was quite inconsolable.—Boston Herald.

A Modest Man's Perplexity

She smiled at me when she and I Met face to face a while ago—
She smiled at me—I wonder why?
Ah, what would I not give to know?
A sweeter, fairer maid than she Has never crossed the path I tread—
A while ago she smiled at me.
I wonder if my nose was red?

When I behold her lovely face
My cares to all the winds are blown.
Her form is lithe and full of grace,
The charms of youth are all her own;
The happy sod should yield a rose
Where'er 'tis pressed by her slim foot—
I wonder if across my nose
There might have been a streak of soot.

The day is dismal when in vain
I watch to see her pass; the skies
Are quickly brightened when I gain
A glimpse of her in passing, from her eyes
I fondly think she smiled because She knew my thoughts or noticed how Befuddled and hay flushed I was?
Perhaps she's laughing at me now.

Sometimes I fancy that she knows
Her luscious beauty gladdens me;
Sometimes I think that she shows
A willingness to let me see.
She smiled upon me when we met,
Then looked at ze when we met,
Sometimes I gladly think—and yet—
Perhaps—she smiled! I wonder what?

MOVING AMERICAN CITIES

RAILROAD DOING MUCH TO HELP IN THE WORK.

Union Stations at Washington, Buffalo, Cleveland and Elsewhere Features of Plans of Municipal Improvements—Millions Spent on the Project.

The present movement for municipal improvement in American cities has one feature for which the railroads of industry are to be thanked as much as the reformers and architects. Great terminal railroad stations that are worthy of the cities are in course of construction or projected in all parts of the country. Of late years railroads have shown themselves willing to cooperate with the municipalities in making the terminals a part of the plans to embellish parks and the grounds of semi-public buildings.

Cleveland is one city that will soon have imposing railroad stations, and Chicago and Buffalo are looked for. Chicago and Buffalo stations are being built in accordance with a plan of improvement

Frank Miles Day, chairman of the committee on railroads of the American Institute of Architects, and a member of the City Club recently addressed the progressive organization of the New York Central Railroad and the Pennsylvania Railroads [illegible] two splendid terminals and the [illegible] ridding much valuable land for [illegible] in front of the stations.

"If the railroads are willing to do this much for the city," said Mr. Day, "why shouldn't the city do something? There are several blocks near the Grand Central Station which the city could acquire at a reasonable cost. Not only would the approach to the station be far more effective, but the circulation of traffic would be greatly simplified."

Mr. Day does not believe that great blocks of buildings should be condemned to make way for parkways and plazas merely for aesthetic reasons. If the increase in property values fails to result from improvements, then the [illegible] are not justified.

Cleveland, the city where the [illegible] est results are expected, has selected for improvement a part of the city which, though near its center, has no buildings of great value, the land itself being less costly than that which surrounds it. The scheme consists of a central mall leading from Lake Erie into the city. At the head of the mall the postoffice is now being built. Balancing it appears the proposed public library, while at either side, near the foot of the mall, are shortly to be built the city hall and county building.

Cleveland has long been notorious for its bad stations, but the union station, which will terminate the mall at the lake end, will be ample in size and treatment for the needs of a rapidly growing city of 400,000 inhabitants. Access will be had to it from the higher level of the city through a small park, the trains being at a lower level.

Still further lakeward is proposed a landing place for passenger steamers. The promoters of the scheme believe that the entranceway to the city will hardly be surpassed for dignity and beauty anywhere in the world.

In Washington the big terminal is now partly constructed, as the plans indicated by the commission of experts. In some other respects the carrying out of the commission's plan is not likely to proceed as rapidly as the Cleveland plan.

The terminal will be a station about half a mile from the Capitol. In front of the terminal will be a plaza, 1000x500 feet, for military manoeuvres and public occasions.

The plaza is to be excavated from the ground. In some places [illegible] will be filled into a depth of [illegible] feet. The station itself is a [illegible] with imposing entrances [illegible] ways will lead from it to the Capitol Hill.

Mr. Day believes that Washington may in time be a city of 750,000 inhabitants and that the plans [illegible] are none too comprehensive.

Buffalo, the second largest railroad centre of the country, has [illegible] terminals of any large city. The streets, however, were laid out on an excellent plan and lend themselves well to the improvements. In which the new station is, of course, an important feature.

Delaware avenue, Genesee street and other important thoroughfares converge at Niagara Square. This square is the apex in a triangular piece of land, the base being the lake front selected for improvement.

The station will be close to the lake, and between the station and Niagara Square a park is to be laid out. Already options have been secured on 90 per cent of the property, and the railroads are willing to go ahead with their share of the work.

The station will not be a terminal, but a way station through which all trains can run in either direction without backing, as they must do in the present terminals. This feature of the plan has had great effect in influencing the railroads in its favor.

The plans for the new terminal in Chicago, already a city of many railroad stations, propose the expenditure of something like [illegible]—New York Sun.

Great terminal railroad stations that are worthy gateways to the cities are in course of construction or projected in all parts of the country. Of late years the railroads have shown themselves willing to cooperate with the municipalities by making the terminals an integral part of the plans to extend and connect parks and the grouping of public and semi-public buildings.

Cleveland is the city where the most striking results along these lines are hoped for, but in Washington, Chicago and Buffalo great terminals are being built or projected in accordance with a general city plan of improvement.

Frank Miles Day, chairman of the committee on municipal improvement of the American Institute of Architects, read a paper before the institute recently in which he described the progress of ten cities. The New York Central and Pennsylvania railroads are making this city two splendid terminals and are sacrificing much valuable land for plazas in front of the stations.

"If the railroads are willing to do this much for the city," said Mr. Day, "why shouldn't the city do something? There are several blocks near the Grand Central Station which the city could acquire at a reasonable cost. The terminal will be a union station about half a mile from the Capitol. In front of the terminal will be a plaza, 1000x500 feet, for military manœuvres and public celebrations.

The plaza is to be entirely made over. In some places earth will be dug into a depth of thirty-five feet. The station itself is a vast building with imposing entrances. Great parkways will lead from it to Capitol and White House.

Buffalo, the second largest railroad centre of the country, has the worst approaches of any large city. The plans, however, were laid out on an excellent plan and lend themselves readily to improvements, in which a new station is, of course, an important feature.

A REST CURE.

City Men Who Buy Farms and Let Others Work Them.

Most city men are going to retire to the country some time, if you may believe what they say, and they don't propose to wait for a fortune either. All they want is the assurance of a fair living. The unanimity of sentiment is remarkable, and so is the cause from which it springs, an infinite weariness that seems well-nigh universal in city life and that is felt not in old age merely, but by active, energetic business and professional men in their prime. It is anything to get away from noise and close confinement and the strenuous competition that produces ceaseless friction.

There is something rather pathetic in the progress of the disease, and when it is so bad as to induce an investment in farm property the pathos is very apt to increase. The city work is now contemplated as a passing phase of existence, useful only as it may contribute to the upbuilding of the country estate, and the citizen of the world becomes as simple as a child. He would consult the authorities, and having purchased land for an orange ranch in California, he thinks himself to write to the editor of one of the farmers' weeklies on the coast for a statement of the profits that he is going to make when his trees are grown. Of course he has had a statement already from the promoter who sold him the land, which was worth $25 an acre, for $100, but he has been a little unsettled by the comment of pessimists and wants confirmation.

The editor, however, is a person of vast experience in such cases and the wisest of oracles. He intimates that California is a large state and that there may be difference of soil in an acre lot. Oranges do well in some localities and not at all well in others. Sometimes the market is good and sometimes bad. Evidently this oracle is admirably equipped to head a safe and sane ticket, but there is a real compassion in his heart, and he suggests that long-distance orange culture has its disquieting aspects. Can't the anxious inquirer personally conduct operations?

Unfortunately, it is not often that he can, for he has to keep right on earning enough at the old trade to make up the deficit, and only recently we saw one of his letters, which was written twelve years after he had begun the rest cure and which showed that he was still inquiring, if not learning. He said that his place had never come anywhere near paying expenses and indicated that his susceptibilities had been shocked by certain unexpected and disagreeable developments. The promoter, who, it is to be hoped, has reformed by this time, had laid particular stress upon the fine quality of the oranges in the particular district where his land was and also upon the marvelous propensity to ripen early when prices promised independence and the delights of foreign travel. But, as a matter of fact, they were among the last on the market and not better than punk.

That is really very pathetic, but let me not forget the benefits in the annually renewed hopes and the satisfaction of knowing that the private sanitarium was pretty near ready for occupancy any time. Who would say that there is not rest in a twelve-year pipe dream?—Chicago Record-Herald.

IMPORTANCE OF CARBON.

Without It or Its Equivalent We Could Have No Arc-Light.

The electric arc-light as now so commonly used is produced by the passage of a powerful electric current between the slightly separated ends of a pair of carbon rods, or "carbons," about twelve inches long and from three-eighths to one-half inch in diameter, placed vertically end to end in the lamp. The lamp mechanism is so constructed that when no current is passing, the upper carbon, which is always made the positive one, rests upon the lower by the action of gravity; but as soon as the electric current is established the carbons are automatically separated about an eighth of an inch, thus forming a gap of high resistance in the electric circuit, across which the current is forced, resulting in the production of intense heat. The ends of the carbons are quickly heated to brilliant incandescence, and by the burning action of the air are maintained in the form of blunt points. As the carbons burn away, the lamp mechanism feeds the upper one downward just fast enough to maintain the proper separation.

The carbons are not heated equally, the upper or positive one being much the hotter. A small cup-shaped cavit, or "crater," ordinarily less than an eighth of an inch in diameter, is formed in its end, the glowing concave surface of which emits the greater part of the total light. In lights of the usual size, something like half a horse power of energy is concentrated in this little crater, and its temperature is limited only by the vaporization of the carbon. Carbon being the most refractory substance known, the temperature of the crater is the highest yet produced artificially, and ranks next to that of the sun. It is fortunate that nature has provided us with such a substance as carbon, combining, as it does, the highest resistance to heat with the necessary electrical conductivity. Without carbon, or an equivalent—and none is known—we could have no arc-light.—From Charles F. Brush's "The Arc-Light," in the Century.

AN ELECTRICAL AERIAL FERRY.

BY FRANK C. PERKINS.

The aerial ferry at Duluth, Minn., the first structure of its kind in this country, has been completed and is now in operation.

The suspended ferry car has a normal speed of about four miles per hour, but the electrical motors and driving equipment are capable of propelling the car at twice that speed should it become desirable, and the passage of the canal can be made by the suspended ferry car in slightly over one minute.

There are two electric motors, each of fifty-horse-power capacity, located under the floors of the car. These electric motors operate two drums, each of which is nine feet in diameter, and on these drums are wound cables one inch in diameter, extending to the truss and then over idle wheels nine feet in diameter through the inside of the lower chords to tower, where they are fastened, and thus produce the motion which causes the car to travel across the canal.

The canal was adopted by the United States Government about four years ago, increasing its width from 240 to 300 feet in width, and constructing permanent piers of crib-work and concrete.—Scientific American.

How the Japanese Have Developed a New and Novel Method of Performing the Work.

The Japanese have developed a new and very convenient way of measuring distances, which has proved very useful in their war. The common way in the army of measuring great distances is to station two officers at a distance apart, and make a triangulation; that is, each of them directs his glass at the same angle until the two lines of convergence meet at some point. Then the distance between the officers is measured for the base line, and the real distance found by computation.

THE JAPANESE METHOD.

The Japanese have adopted a horizontal staff with eye positions and degrees marked off at each end. These are adjusted to bear upon a given point. The angles are read and the distances between them gives the distance of the object. This staff is so arranged that it can be readily used anywhere, even behind a tree which will shelter the topographical engineer who is making the survey.

RACK FOR THE NURSERY.

As the nursing bottle is an essential feature in the average household, the wonder is that appliances for its efficient and convenient manipulation are looked upon as curiosities and luxuries, instead of being considered necessities. The only explanation of this phenomenon is apparently found in the inherent trait in woman that induces her to go through life without adequate tools and appliances, compelling her to resort to the much-maligned hairpin. It is to the credit of womankind, however, that the bottle holding and draining rack illustrated herewith is the recent patent of a woman of Washington. This nursery accessory consists of a shallow trough having a bottom, on which bottles may be supported in an upright position, and a series of projections to support bottles in an inverted position for draining. Foreign newspapers circulating in Russia, the land of caviare, are examined by the press censors before they are offered for sale by the newsboys. When the censor finds it unnecessary to eliminate entire pages, any objectionable articles undergo what is known as the "caviare" process before they are distributed. This consists of the daubing over of the condemned passages with printer's ink, or, as a suffering correspondent has aptly termed it, "a nauseous and dirty mixture of lamp-black and oil." Sand is then scattered over them, and the whole is put in a press. The result is a lattice-pattern, in appearance not unlike pressed caviare, and called by the Russians "press-caviare."—New York News.

compasses would draw on a flat surface if opened to the same extent. The breadth of the oval will depend on the size of the cylinder used.

Ovals drawn in this way are not true ellipses such as are made with the pins and string, but they can scarcely be distinguished from ellipses and are just as good for the openings in photograph mats and most other ornamental purposes.—New York Evening Mail.

WHO ATE THE RING?

Harold was having a birthday party because he was six years old, and Aunt Helen and grandma and Miss Nellie and ever so many big people were there, helping all the little people to have a splendid time. They played games and sat in the darkened parlor to look at the magic lantern pictures till the clock struck five, and then Harold knew what was coming.

Out in the dining-room the table was set with mamma's prettiest china, and there were candles and flowers and bon-bons just like a grown-up party.

Harold was very anxious to have all the children see the table. So he was glad when Aunt Helen said, "Now we are going to march to the dining-room."

Miss Nellie played a bright little march, and the boys and girls formed a long line through the parlor and out on the piazza, "just like a long white ribbon," said grandma; for most of the girls wore white dresses and the boys white waists.

The tiny sandwiches and wee pickles vanished like magic, and all the grown-up people were kept busy waiting on the little folk. Playing games makes one very hungry, you know, and most of the guests had been too excited to eat much dinner that day. Altogether it was a very jolly supper, and, when mamma wanted to make a little speech, she had to ring the tea bell several times.

"Now, children," she said, "I am going to pass some little cakes, and one of them has a ring baked in it. You must eat them very slowly and carefully, so some one does not swallow it. You must not break up the cakes to find the ring, but just nibble away till some little boy or girl says, 'I've got the ring.'"

Aunt Helen brought in ice-cream, made to look like dear little chickens, and the children ate the cakes and the cream very slowly. At last all had been eaten, and still no one had said, "I've got the ring."

"That is very strange," said mamma. "I will ask Mary if any one took one of the cakes."

"No, ma'am," said the maid positively. "There has been no one but me in the dining-room since I put the cakes on the table."

"I just know I swallowed it," sobbed a little girl. "I felt it going down."

"So did I," said a tiny boy, and he had to cry too.

"There, there!" said Mrs. Clifford, much perplexed. "Two of you couldn't have eaten it, so don't cry."

"I feel bad, too," said another little girl. "I think it must have been in my cake."

I really don't know what would have happened just then if papa hadn't come in. He was so surprised to see tears at a birthday party that he had to inquire the cause, though he was in a big hurry.

"Well, well," he laughed. "I didn't know what a commotion I would cause by taking one cake. I was on my way to see a little patient who has been in bed a long time with a lame limb, and I wanted to take her some of the goodies. I slipped softly in here a little while ago and took some of the nice things without disturbing the party a bit. Even Mary didn't see me. Now, I just wonder if little Bess Ryan isn't wearing that ring this minute?"

"O papa, won't you go right over and see?" begged Harold.

"I hope she did get it," cried all the children. And, sure enough, in a few minutes Dr. Clifford came back to tell how happy the little girl was with her treasure.

"She is sitting propped up in her old bed, looking at the pretty green stone in the gold band," said papa, "and I didn't go in at all. Are you all glad poor Bess got it?"

"Yes! Yes! Yes!" cried the children.

JAMIE'S TRUST.

Flora had two babies. They looked like little yellow balls curled up beside her on the old coat in the barn. One had one black ear and one yellow ear, the other two yellow ears and a black spot on the end of his stump of a tail. How Jamie laughed when they stuck up their little back wet noses and made a funny yipping noise.

He went to the barn a dozen times a day to see the puppies. He wanted to take them some meat, but mamma said they were too little to eat meat yet. Once when Flora had left them for a minute Jamie carried them to the back porch to play with them.

They cried and went sniffing around the porch on their weak legs as if looking for their mother. Flora heard them and came running to the porch. How they came tumbling to her when they heard her whine! She poked them with her nose and licked them with her tongue. Then she seized one by the nap of its neck and lifted it from the porch.

Jamie was terrified. "Mamma! mamma!" he screamed, "Flora is eating her puppies."

"No, no, she wants to take them to the barn."

One morning papa said: "I will have to take Flora to-day. I need her to watch the wagon."

He whistled and Flora came bounding from the barn. When she saw Prince hitched to the wagon she knew what was expected of her. She cowered at her master's feet and whined piteously. "Come, girl, up with you," said papa.

Instead of jumping into the wagon she raced away to the barn. In a moment she returned, whining and barking. No amount of urging would make her get into the wagon.

"It's her puppies; she doesn't want to leave them," said mamma.

"I'll watch 'em for you," said Jamie, running into the barn with the dog.

Flora seemed to understand. She went to the old coat, and, taking a puppy up, laid it at Jamie's feet. Then she brought the other. Reaching up she gave Jamie a lap in the face with her tongue, as much as to say: "Be good to my babies;" and, in a moment more, leaped into her place on the wagon.

How carefully Jamie watched Flora's puppies during that long summer day. He fed them milk from a saucer. He brought them out under the apple tree and made them a bed in the grass.

The puppies seemed to like it. They rolled around on the grass and snapped at the flies that lit on the red clover blossoms. Once one of them crawled up into Jamie's lap and went to sleep.

"It's nearly time for papa to come," said mamma late in the afternoon. "Are Flora's puppies all right?"

"Yes, mamma, but I think they are tired."

"You had better sit down and let them rest."

So Jamie brought his little red chair to a shady spot at the side of the house near the nasturtium bed. He took the puppies up in his arms and sat down to wait. Before very long Prince's head appeared above the hill top. Flora saw Jamie while the wagon was still far up the road. Leaping from the seat she ran on ahead. How the puppies whined and barked when they saw their mother! Flora immediately started for the barn with one in her mouth. Jamie followed her and laid the other puppy on the coat.

What a washing those puppies did get! Jamie certainly though Flora would wear her great red tongue out.

"She doesn't seem to think you are a very clean nurse," said papa, laughing.

An Amateur Actor.

Mr. George Alexander is much troubled by amateurs, who believe themselves born for the stage, and who come to him for advice.

One of these, the scion of a noble family, whose talent is patent only to himself, was continually pestering Mr. Alexander, and various were the ruses which the latter adopted to evade him. The following is probably the best one:

Walking along the Strand one day, Alexander espied the would-be actor hurrying toward him. There seemed to be no way of escape. A barber's shop, however, was at hand, and into this Alexander dashed.

To the astonishment of the proprietor and his assistants, he seized an apron that lay on a chair, tied it around him, and commenced to lather one of the customers assiduously.

Meanwhile his tormentor entered the shop and looked around. "Pardon me," he remarked to the proprietor. "I thought I saw Mr. Alexander come in here, but I must have been mistaken," and out he walked, much to his victim's delight.

CLANTON HIGH SCHOOL.

This school will open on Monday next, and though for the present it will be held in the old school building, yet from the reputation of the corps of teachers that are engaged, the school should be an unqualified success. Now every one turn to and put their shoulder to the wheel, and send in the children; do your duty and the teachers will do theirs, and Clanton will have a school second to none. Don't send your children away from home to school, but keep them here under your own care, which supervision is always better than any you can hire.

TO THE REPUBLICAN VOTERS OF CHILTON COUNTY.

We, the undersigned, members of the Republican County Executive Committee, recognize that there has been some differences in our party, and in order to harmonize all factions we ask ALL republican voters of the county to meet in mass meeting at Thorsby, Ala., September 15, 1905, at 10 o'clock a. m. for the purpose of electing an Executive Committee that will represent THE ENTIRE Republican party of the county. Now, you may be busy on this date, but you can afford to lose one day to help harmonize our party. We hope to have a good crowd, and remember we will soon be confronted with another election.

REPUBLICAN MEETING.

The Republican meeting called at Thorsby for the 15th should be well attended, and the party should get together and present a solid front to our democratic opponents. Every one turn out and let's have a rousing big meeting, which will be a forerunner of success next year. Chilton county does not need a democratic sheriff and will not elect one.

CHILTON COTTON ASSOCIATION.

Clanton, Ala., Sept. 2, 1905.

Pursuant to call of President W. H. Conway, the Chilton County Branch of the S. C. A. met at Court House and was called to order by President Conway, after which he introduced Hon. H. Y. Brooke, of Luverne, state organizer of the association, who made a very interesting and instructive speech, also answered many questions, after which the association adjourned for dinner. At 1:30 the association was called to order by President Conway and proceeded to collect reports from the several districts of the condition and estimated yield of the cotton crop this year as compared with last year finding the average to be 68 1-3 per cent. Mr. Brooke agreed to telegraph both county papers the result of the Asheville meeting.

Both papers are requested to post bulletin of results of Asheville meeting in front of their office doors at earliest date possible.

A resolution was passed requesting our delegates to Asheville to use their best efforts to have resolutions adopted urging all farmers to market the present crop of cotton gradually, thereby enhancing the value of same, and that the minimum price be ten cents; also referring to the good judgment of said meeting the question of the establishment of an organ to be published weekly in the interest of the said association.

The association adjourned, agreeing to meet on first Saturday of each month for the balance of this year.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Several letters reached us on Wednesday too late to get in our columns this week. We wish you all would get your letters in by Tuesday at the latest, as that gives us time to look over them properly.

THE PLANTERS' WAREHOUSE

Is looking for your trade and has an advertisement in this paper. Our next issue will contain some additional information in regard to this enterprise.

THORSBY LETTER.

Our county clerk, Mr. S. A. Collins, was in town last week. We are sure his frequent visits confirm the report we hear about him. Mr. O. Schive made a business trip to Birmingham last week. Mrs. Foss entertained several of her friends on Friday night. Her son, Reuben Foss, left for Rock Island, Ill., on Saturday morning, where he will enter upon his third term in the Augustana College. Justin Thorson left for St. Peter, Ia., where he will attend college. Miss Frieda Turnquist left for Birmingham on Saturday. A reception given by the members of the Commercial Club in honor of Mr. M. J. Barrett and his bride was held at the Thorsby Inn on Saturday night. Owing to the beautiful night the guests occupied the verandas, which were decorated with Japanese lanterns. Mrs. Dr. Stabler won the prize in the can factory contest, she being awarded a large can of pears. The menu for the evening consisted of coffee, sandwiches, pickles, ice cream and assorted cakes. The boys of our town did not fail to serenade the newly married couple. We are glad to welcome Mrs. Barrett in our midst and wish both bride and groom a long and happy life. Mr. and Mrs. Goss recently arrived here from Ocamp and are living in the R. Smith home. Mr. Goss is assisting Mr. P. C. Smith in the depot. Mr. R. Smith and family have gone to Bessemer, where they will remain for an indefinite length of time. Mrs. Wishart is visiting friends and relatives in Birmingham. Mr. P. C. Smith and wife took their sick child to a specialist in Birmingham. The child seems to be in a critical condition. Much sympathy is expressed for the suffering child and for the anxious parents. Mr. Wright spent several days in Birmingham this week. Miss Hattie Horn, who had been home on account of ill health for some time, has returned to Montgomery. Quite a large crowd witnessed the baseball game in town on Saturday afternoon which was played between the Collins Chapel boys and our team. For a while it appeared as though the Chapel boys would be victorious, but toward the end of the game our boys did some fine playing and they came out the winners, the score being 24 to 19. The Chapel boys made several splendid hits. Our boys did their best work in the field. Mrs. Carl Langville is making a short visit in Birmingham. Mr. Ira E. Sarber returned from a visit to the north on the 5th. President J. Bice, of the Warehouse Co., went to Birmingham Wednesday on business for that company. M. A. Magnusson, the florist, made a business trip to Birmingham Wednesday.

CHATTERBOX.

COURT NOTES.

Habeas corpus proceedings in the case of Jesse and Frank Price (colored) brought before Judge Reynolds Friday, resulted in the two negroes being held and turned over to the Sheriff of Coosa County; Attorney J. O. Middleton appeared for the State and showed to the court that in spite of the defects in the warrant the statement of facts contained therein was sufficient to hold these parties.

Mollie Kendricks had a preliminary trial Monday before Judge Reynolds on the charge of infanticide. Attorney J. O. Middleton appeared for the State and Attorney Tipton Mullins for the defendant. After the witnesses were examined and an effective speech delivered by Attorny Middleton, the accused was held in $300 bond to the Grand Jury. This is the case from near Coopers, in which there has already been a coroner's inquest and a preliminary trial before Justice McDowell, who acquitted the negroes.

RANDOLPH.

Cotton picking is the order of the day. Revival services are being held at the Baptist church. The pastor is being assisted by Mr. Parker, of Texas. During last week revival services were held at Antioch, a few miles west of town. The pastor was assisted by Mr. J. M. McCord, who formerly lived in Chilton, and was well known as an able and earnest minister. We were pleased with the correspondence from Pleasant Grove in last Union. Let the good work go on. Prof. Toy Williams, of Mulberry, was in town last week prospecting for a school. We look around us and can see some evidence that the year of 1905 is dying. The cotton fields are white. The corn fields are brown and sear. So with human life. But the dying season of the year has its beauties as well as other seasons. Why the spring and summer is never more beautiful than the quiet autumn. So with men and women. See the old man or old lady in whose cheeks time has plowed furrows, whose locks are silvered by the frosts of many winters. See them trying to move with the elasticity of youth. See them gaudily attired in dress that is rich and gay. They apparently are laboring to retain the charms of youth. Are they beautiful? No. But see the old person who has consecrated their life to their creator, their dress is plain and becoming, their cheeks are marked with the hand of time, their locks are silvered, their step is feeble, yet they are beautiful. We have in mind an old lady whose physical strength was waning, yet in church service she would sing with almost the energy of youth and with uplifted "holy hands" would adopt the language of the poet, "I am watching, I am waiting for the summons to come." She was beautiful. Let us all do likewise. Let us hear from Mr. Job Reynolds again. Yours for the success of the great common people and THE UNION.

"ONE OF THE BOYS."

CENTER POINT.

Editor Union:

Health of this community is good. Fodder pulling is done and cotton picking is all the go now. Some have had cotton ginned already. When a farmer can get 10 cents or better for cotton he had better sell, though I see no reason why we should not get a good price this season, as the cotton crop is certainly cut off one-third or more. We saw a piece in the banner from a fellow signed "Subscriber," where he said that Fair View and Center Point played a game of ball, but he is badly mistaken. Center Point played the pick of 8 good ball teams, and they beat us, but they can't take their own team and do it. We are sure glad to see Bro. Culpepper's letter in THE UNION about the F. E. and C. U. of A. Stick to it, brother farmers, for the time is come that we MUST organize. There's no union in reach of me, and if there don't come one soon, I'll go where I can reach it. We're glad to see the Apportioners of the several beats, giving notice to have the public roads worked. We have a good road law if it was enforced. We love to read the letters in THE UNION and we are sure we have got one of the BEST county papers in Alabama. A few more hot days and then cotton picking will be over and the cold, bleak winter winds will come and we'll pass into another year, just so it is with men.

C. W. L.

LOMAX.

Editor Union:

We're having some fine weather now. Cotton is opening fast and picking is being pushed. The crop will be far below that of last year. Some sickness in our community, but we are glad to say the sick are improving. Mr. W. W. Jones lost his little nine-year-old son, Wallace, on Sept. 1st. He died from congestion of the brain, being sick only a few hours, from 11 p. m. to 7 a. m. All aid that human hands could give was rendered, but death was the only thing that could relieve the little sufferer. We say to the bereaved family that it should be a great consolation to know that he is at rest in a better world than this and will have to suffer no more. The parents, brother and sister have our heartfelt sympathy.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is hit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

THE SUNBEAM.

Down it came dancing, dancing,
Straight from the land of light,
In through a poor attic window,
Making the darkness bright.

Glanced off a broken mirror
On to an old arm-chair,
Lit up a pale-faced sufferer,
Wearily tossing there.

Brought with it hope and gladness,
Soothing the restless boy,
Lulled him to sleep with bright visions,
Whispered of health and joy.

And to a far-off country,
Washed by refreshing streams,
Guided his slumbering spirit
Into the land of dreams.

Then when its task was over,
Softly floated away,
Back to its home in the sunshine,
Its mission fulfilled that day.

Oh! to be like that sunbeam,
Shedding forth light and love,
Then when our labor is ended,
To pass to the light above.

IN A COTTON-CAR

By ALBERT W. TOLMAN.

THE long freight-shed was filled with goods of every description. Through the open doors on one side you looked into the dark interiors of a line of empty cars; through similar doors on the other side you saw a row of loaded diggers and express wagons. Foreman Carruth, whose duty it was to bring order out of all this confusion, seemed to be everywhere at once, directing, exhorting, reproving, his eyes, ears and tongue all busy at the same time.

"Here, Jim, put those steel rods in the corner of that B. & A. car! They're going up to Caribou. Come on with those tierces of lard, boys! If you don't move faster, they'll melt before you get 'em out of the shed. Hustle, everybody! These cars'll be pulled out at eleven."

Down the steps from the office at the upper end of the shed came a billing clerk, with a small brown note book in his hand. This he passed to the foreman, who immediately raised his voice in a shout to a black-haired young Irishman, who was taking account of the incoming freight two doors away.

"Here's a job of blind checking for you, Dan! Go down to track five with this cotton book, and count the bales in those eleven cars for the Leadbetter Mills. Get back as soon as you can. I'll take your place at the door while you're gone."

Daniel Harrigan received the book from the hand of his superior, walked rapidly down the shed, and stepped into the freight yard. It was quarter past eight on a foggy April morning, one of those drizzly spring days when everything is damp and sticky. A thick mist hung over the yard. Invisible shifting engines puffed here and there, with much clanging of bells and shrill of whistling.

With senses on the alert, the freight handler crossed the tracks, carefully avoiding the frogs and switches. His destination was the extreme end of the large yard, a full quarter mile from the shed. Presently the square end of the first car that was to be tallied appeared through the fog. Harrigan consulted his book to make sure that he had the correct number, went up to the door, and broke the little seal of lead and wire.

The interior was filled with cotton bales, each weighing about five hundred pounds. They were covered with burlap, and encircled by steel bands put on under hydraulic pressure, typical specimens of the thousand sent yearly from Southern plantations to New England mills.

As the staple was quoted at twelve cents a pound, and as from forty to sixty bales were loaded into each car, its contents had an average value of three thousand dollars. A mistake in the tally, resulting in the addition or omission of a single bale would make a difference of perhaps $60.

The teams from the Leadbetter Mills on the outskirts of the city would begin to empty the cars that afternoon, and it was customary for the railroad to take careful account of all goods before delivery. Then, in case a shipment ran short, the company would be able to show that the blame must be placed elsewhere.

The task of counting the cotton was a responsible one, and Foreman Carruth had put his best man on the job.

Harrigan climbed to the top of the bales. They were from five to five and a half feet long, something under a yard wide, and twenty-two to twenty-six inches thick. They were set on end, three abreast; and as the distance from floor to roof was approximately seven feet and a half, an empty space of two feet was left above their tops.

Forward crawled the tallyman on his hands and knees, taking note of each separate bale with his fingers, and registering it mentally at the same time.

By the system of "blind checking" under which he worked, only the car numbers were set down in the note book handed to him, and he was given no inkling as to how many bales he was expected to find. When the result of his labors was reported at the office, the clerks there compared it with the way-bills.

The first car contained fifty-four bales. Harrigan dropped to the ground, entered the number in his book and closed the door. He then broke the seal of the next car. In a few minutes he had finished his work in this car also, and charged forty-eight against it. Five cars more were examined without special incident.

With a strong jerk Harrigan broke the seal of the eighth car, shoved the door open just enough to allow his body to pass, and was soon scrambling in the darkness over the burlapped ends. As the roof was lower than those of the other cars, there was barely eighteen inches of open space, and his progress was much slower.

On through the gloom crept the freight handler, fingering the rough edges, and counting in an undertone as he made his tally.

"Sixteen—seventeen—eighteen—" His head bumped against a cross-beam of the roof, and he stooped low to pass beneath it.

"Nineteen—twen——"

The last number was never finished, but died away in a muffled cry of surprise and consternation; for the twentieth bale was not there!

The two hands that he thrust forward, expecting to strike burlap, touched nothing. Down pitched Harrigan head foremost into a cavity just large enough to admit his body. He caught unavailingly with his fingers at the coarse bagging, but so well had the hydraulic press done its work that he could grasp no slack in his frantic clutchings, and his course was not arrested till he struck the hard wooden floor. The sudden shock doubled up his finger tips and drove back his hands. His head came down upon the planks with a stunning crack that made him for the moment half-insensible.

When the car was being loaded at Memphis, there had been found in the shipment one bale considerably broader than the others. It was placed at one end of the seventh row from the door, and a bale of ordinary size was put at the other end. The space between the two was of necessity left vacant, as it was not broad enough to admit another bale. This formed the cavity into which, two weeks later, Daniel Harrigan was unlucky enough to fall.

For perhaps thirty seconds the young Irishman remained inactive, recovering from the effects of the blow upon the top of his skull. His cap had been pulled on so tightly that it had not fallen off when he plunged downward; hence it slightly broke the force of his fall. With returning consciousness, however, he began to feel a shooting pain in his temples.

The second finger, too, on his right hand had been severely sprained, and the nail split down to the quick, so that it was bleeding freely. The full weight of his body resting upon the crown of his head strained the neck muscles severely, and he struggled to raise himself on the palms of his hands.

The change of position had a very unexpected result. All the contents of his pockets poured down upon the floor under his nose in a jangling cascade. He could hear the copper and silver coins and his jack-knife clinking together on the planks. His watch slipped from its place, and hung dangling in his very face.

The situation had a ludicrous as well as an unpleasant side. How should he ever pick up all that loose change from the floor? Evidently the first thing, however, was to restore his heels and his head to their normal positions.

Harrigan did not anticipate any special difficulty in doing this. But when he strove to bend his body over, so that he might stand upright, he found that the cavity was too confined to permit it. His shoulders almost touched the bales on each side, while the one over which he had just crept projected so far forward that the open space was barely eighteen inches from front to back. It was, if anything, a little larger at the bottom than at the top, and this increased the difficulty of his undertaking.

He tried to push first one bale and then the other a little farther away, to gain more room, but all to no avail. His efforts finally convinced him that his only way of escape was to lift himself upward and backward, until he could regain a position on the top of the cotton.

The checker lifted himself at arms' length on the palms of his hands, and tried to stick the tips of his toes into the space between the two bales behind him; but he could not reach back far enough.

He ran his fingers up and down the rough burlap, seeking some loose place, but finding none. So long as he could push with his hands against the floor he could raise his body; but once at arms' length, he had nothing to press against, as the bales afforded no handhold. His strength was of little service, for it could be exerted only through a few inches of space.

By this time it had dawned upon Harrigan that he was in a very serious dilemma. The blood had flowed into his head and arms in such abundance that it had become positively painful. He seemed to be growing all pulse.

Once more he explored the surface of the bales with his fingers, but found it absolutely unyielding. Those who know cotton only as a soft, fluffy substance can have no conception of the hardness it assumes under the compress. No, there was no chance to get hold of the burlap; but in one place, where there was a slight hollow, he was able to press his finger tips down on the edge of a steel band.

Insignificant as the leverage was, it enabled him to raise his body. Cautiously he worked his way up and backward. His knees were almost on the top of the bale; another effort, and he would be safely out of his predicament. But as he pushed with all his might on the sharp top of the steel band his fingers slipped off. Down he fell, and again his hands rested on the floor of the car.

Harrigan at last realized that his life was actually in peril. If he could not get out now, when his strength was practically unimpaired, what chance would he have later! With numb fingers, swelled by the inrushing blood, he fumbled once more up and down the cotton. He found the band on which he had raised himself before, and strove to repeat his attempt; but he fell heavily back, this time striking on his head.

A train rumbled by, shaking the ground and making the car tremble under him. He heard two brakemen calling out to each other, and tried to attract their attention; but his voice was smothered in that narrow cavity.

A heavy, painful drowsiness was creeping over the freight handler, a strange, dull apathy that frightened him. His strength was gradually ebbing away. The part of his body below, or rather, as now situated, above his waist, was losing its feeling. The blood surged through his brain so strongly that it threatened to deprive him of consciousness. Insensibility was coming on, and insensibility meant death.

Harrigan's toes were almost on the top of the bale over which he had crept. He had only to raise himself a little more than two feet to have his bootsoles touch the ceiling behind the beam he had crawled under. By pressing the backs of his heels hard against this beam he could get sufficient leverage to help himself out. The distance was trifling, but there seemed absolutely nothing he could grasp to lift himself with.

Again he felt blindly along the bale in front of him, and thrust his fingers into the spaces between it and the adjacent bales on each side. When cotton leaves the compress, the burlap on the edges that have been lowest in the press is tight to the point of bursting, while that about the upper edges is much looser. Fortunately for Harrigan, the two corners turned toward him, as the bale stood on end, were those round which the covering was close. This apparently trivial circumstance saved his life.

The corners gave him something to grip. Numbed and swollen though his fingers were, he found that by pressing them hard against his palms he could gather in a very respectable handful of the bagging. This gave him purchase enough to lift his weight.

Raising his hands very gradually and hardly daring to breathe, inch by inch he worked himself up and back in agony, clutching the coarse edges with desperate caution. To slip back now would be fatal. Little by little he pushed his toes back over the bale behind him. He lifted one of his heels, and it touched the beam. In a moment it was pressed behind the firm wood. A little more, and he would be safe!

Shifting his grasp with almost imperceptible movements, he raised his body slowly and painfully. Red lights danced before his eyes; the roaring of the ocean was in his ears. Up, up, up! If he could only keep his senses a few seconds more! His body was now well over the tops of the bales behind him, but he did not dare to let go yet.

One handful more, one hurried, violent thrust that sent him back from the edge of the dangerous cavity, and, safe at last, he fainted dead away on the top of the cotton.—Youth's Companion.

How to Lift a Car Window.

One of the cars that was run down town on a Sixth avenue elevated train Wednesday morning had apparently just escaped from the painters' brushes. Consequently all of the windows stuck, and the passengers who had dodged the heat of the subway were not so sure that they had gained anything.

Women and men tried in vain to lift one or two of the windows, but failed. The guards did not seem to care much what happened. At One Hundred and Fourth street a tall man with a sharp eye got into the car.

He, too, had a jug at a window. It stuck, but that didn't stop him. He took out his handkerchief, rolled it up until it looked like a rope, and then looped it around one of the window catches. One tug, and the window went up as if it had never meant to stick.

"Learned that on the road out West," he said. "If you use your handkerchief as a tackle the window has to come open or the catch come right out of the frame. You can put every muscle in your back into the job."

Half of the passengers tried the plan with unvarying success.—New York Times.

City vs. Country Eyes.

In one of his delightful books Dr. Jessopp remarks that whereas country people look up, Londoners look down. It is largely this habit that has limited their observing powers; but London has itself to blame. I take it that one can observe well only by the power of taking large views, and in London this is impossible, even if one would, partly from the circumscribing effects of bricks and mortar, partly from the dim light of a London distance, and partly from the need of avoiding collisions. One's eyes unconsciously acquire a habit of restricted vision: our observation specializes, like that of the little girl in Mrs. Meynell's book who beguiled the tedium of her walks by collecting shopkeepers named Jones. Perhaps that is the kind of observation for which we in London are best suited.—London Outlook.

SCIENCE & MECHANICS

The "flicker" sometimes noticed in lightning proves to be due to the fact that several flashes—sometimes five or six—follow one path too rapidly to be separated by the eye. The trails shown in photographs of very bright flashes are caused by incandescence produced in the air for a very brief period.

A quite extraordinary combination of merits, is claimed in France for a new explosive, which consists of a mixture of powdered aluminum and nitrate of ammonium. It is not liable to spontaneous combustion, cannot be prematurely exploded by shock or friction, burns only with difficulty, is not affected by frost or dampness, and the gases from its explosion are harmless.

An inventor has hit upon a method of putting what are practically stone soles on boots and shoes. He mixes a waterproof glue with a suitable quantity of clean quartz sand and spreads it over the leather soles used as a foundation. These quartz soles are said to be very flexible and practically indestructible, and to give the foot a firm hold even on the most slippery surface.—Chicago Journal.

Aluminium-coated paper, made in Germany for wrapping food substances, is prepared by applying a thin coat of an alcoholic solution of resin to artificial parchment, then sprinkling aluminium powder over the surface, and finally submitting to pressure. The artificial parchment is paper that has been treated with sulphuric acid. The aluminium paper is not attacked by the air or by fats.

The curious dread of cats that has been studied for three years by Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, of Philadelphia, may open up a wide field for investigation. An advertisement brought 159 replies from different countries — including Germany, Egypt and India—and about two-thirds of them mentioned cases of fear of cats, the others referring to asthma from cats. This asthma, due to odors, may be excited by the presence of horses, dogs, cats or sheep, or even of roses, apples, oranges or bananas. The catphobia comes instantaneously, and may be very severe, catalepsy having developed in one case, and temporary blindness in another.

In the examination of food substances and other materials, microscopists often find it necessary to compare two slides. This soon becomes very tedious by the usual method of substituting one slide for another or using duplicate microscopes, and a laborious study of starches, fibers, etc., has led two English investigators to devise a much simpler process. The new idea is a piece of apparatus known as the Ashe Finlayson comparascope. The second slide is placed upon a horizontal rod attached to the side of the nosepiece of the microscope, and a mirror and lens project the image into the nosepiece, where an inclined reflector deflects the rays up the microscope tube.

Nathaniel Hawthorne.

Ellery Channing's description of Hawthorne, which Frank Sanborn reproduces in his notes of Channing's table talk, the first of his papers on Concord reminiscences in The Critic, may be classed as unique. At least, it is quite unlike the stock characterizations in the books.

"He was a soft, bulky person, with a rolling gait like a sea captain, which his father had been. My former schoolmate, Tom Appleton, said he looked like a 'boned pirate.' Perhaps he walked so because he was so stout—rolling and swaying about in walking. I have walked much with him, but he was not fond of that exercise; he had the greatest aversion to company—thought it a 'bore,' and would swear about it sometimes; he was a good sweager, you must know. He had no reverence for what is called human nature; he thought it a very miserable article; besides he had the greatest difficulty in expressing himself in conversation. He would stammer and twist himself about, but he wrote easily enough."—Boston Herald.

Mad Englishmen.

A number of Scotchmen were exchanging reminiscences of "mad Englishmen," as they called them, with whom they had had experience. One of them had done some work for a traveling geologist. "He gave me a bag," said he, "to carry to the inn by a short cut across the hills while he walked by another road. I was wondering myself why it was so dreadfully heavy, and when I got out of his sight I was determined to see what was in it. I opened it, and what do you think it was? But I need not ask you to guess, for you would never find out. It was stones!" "Stones!" exclaimed his companion, opening his eyes; "stones! well, well, that beats all I ever knew or heard of Englishmen! And did you carry it?" "Carry it! Do you think I was as mad as themselves? No! I emptied them all out. But I filled the bag from the cairn near the inn and gave him good measure for his money."

Squelched.

He was an earnest student of modern literature, and the little man opposite would persist in trying to talk as the train moved on. After countering several conversational gambits, the student began to grow tired. "The grass is very green now, isn't it?" said the little man, pleasantly. "Yes," said the other, "such a change from the blue and red grass we've been having lately." And in the silence that followed he began Chapter XII.—London Globe.

THE PULPIT.

A SCHOLARLY SUNDAY SERMON BY THE REV. ALBERT JONES LORD.

Subject: Sacrament of Service.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—The Rev. Albert Jones Lord, pastor of the First Congregational Church, Meriden, Conn., preached in Plymouth Church Sunday morning in exchange with the assistant pastor, the Rev. Willard P. Harmon. Mr. Lord had a good audience, and preached an excellent sermon. His subject was "The Sacrament of Service." The text was from Isaiah xli:6: "They helped every one his neighbor, and every one said to his brother, 'Be of good courage.'" Mr. Lord said:

We have been passing rapidly in the last half century from an individualistic to a social type of civilization. Paul's words were never more true than to-day, when he said, "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." All the forces and factors pertaining to human life—mechanical, social and religious—have been moving to such a degree toward each other that the twentieth century can say that the one word which will serve her best for a watchword is "Together; together."

In the industrial world the concentration of forces is most manifest. Dr. Josiah Strong calls to mind how that fifty years ago it was the age of homespun. Families could meet all the needs of their households, spinning, weaving and the making of garments. The fields about the home supplied the inmates with the necessities of life. Then it was that the main force was the brawny arm. But to-day manufacture has forsaken the home for the mill and the factory, and steam and electricity are the regnant forces. Division of labor has taken the place of the single hand. Then one man made many things; now many men make one thing.

But as industrially, so socially are we becoming more intimately related. A half century ago there were communities, many but small in number and limited in advantages, yet complete in themselves. Citizens seldom went beyond the borders of their respective towns. But gradually those communities have been grouped into towns, and the towns developed into cities and the cities into greater cities. Whereas our fathers were independent of all the world, we are more or less dependent on the whole world. This made Robert Louis Stevenson exclaim, "It is really disheartening how we depend on other people in this life."

This complex life has given rise to a great many social and fraternal organizations. Men have banded themselves together for mutual helpfulness: Fathers, working by the week and for small wages, having little ones depending upon them, have serious thoughts when they realize that sickness may be lying in wait for them and short hours may be their lot. When the head of the family is sick and unable to work, the income ceases, but expenses increase. To meet all these possibilities the various benevolent societies and fraternal organizations have come into existence.

It is every man's duty to consider not only the present demands of the family, but its future welfare. It is a crime for a father to spend his money freehanded at the bar, or in hospitality at the club, or squander it in sports, when he has not, either in the savings bank or in insurance, made secure the future welfare of his family. It is every man's duty to endow the future with as good a livelihood for his family as lies in his power.

We heartily sympathize with fraternities and societies in their sick benefits and care of widows and fatherless children. They have a mission in society. But, however commendable they may be, they must not take the place of the two divine institutions—the home and the church. There is but one place where God has set up the altar of domestic affection, where conjugal relations are sanctified by the presence of children, and that is the home; and there is but one institution which the Son of God ordained while upon earth, and that is the Christian church. Fraternal organizations should be supplements, but never attempt to be substitutes for the home or the church.

But we cannot say that because life is becoming more highly organized it can be lived more easily. On the other hand, we are inclined to say that the closer men's relations are the greater the friction and the more difficult to have every event work good to every person. This kind of life, I repeat, is far better but more difficult to live in all its relations. The tone of a three or five bank organ is much better, richer, more sympathetic and harmonious than the tone of a cabinet organ. In the one there are few combinations, while in the other there are hundreds. An amateur can play the one, but only the master organist can play the other satisfactorily. So in these times of highly developed social and religious life it is difficult to live a full, rounded Christian life. A company of people spread over a large area can get along comfortably well, but crowded into a small inclosure they will suffer embarrassment. They all have elbows, and where it is ideal to march through life, touching elbow to elbow, it is not so comfortable when men are cramped and their elbows touch one another under the arms. Our whole social life is, therefore, a question of elbows.

This leads us naturally to the question, How can life be lived so as to fulfill all these manifold relations. The answer is found in the words of the text. "They helped every one his neighbor and every one said to his brother, 'Be of good courage.'" I wish these words might be placed over the doors of every church, inscribed upon the walls of every place of worship and selected as a watchword for every charitable organization. What a change would this world be if the sentiment of this text should go into effect to-morrow morning. The words suggest to us two ways by which we may administer the sacrament of service.

Humanity is in constant need of help. The circle of suffering and misfortune is all the while changing, but it never happens to be empty. In spite of the fact that we are a rich country and are living in times of plenty, there are children in every city in need of bread, and elderly people in need of support and comfort. It is no disgrace to be poor or to be sick if we have done all in our power to drive away the wolf from the door and [illegible] germs in our system [illegible] more so than the [illegible] Paul was poor, having few [illegible] sessions but "the clo[illegible] ment;" Peter was [illegible] gold have I none." But there is another way to [illegible] offer the sacrament of service than [illegible] giving food to eat and raiment [illegible] on: It is sugg[illegible]ed by the last [illegible] the text: "And every one said to his brother, 'Be of good courage.'" There are men and women in this world who need an encouraging word more [illegible] they need bread. Man does not live by bread alone. There are [illegible] streets who have [illegible] their lives. They are [illegible] discouraged and distress[illegible] Christ says, "Be of good courage." Very few of us realize how much help there is in a handshake given in a brotherly way. Chrysanthemum proudly appeared on first and the other garments on top of it, making a very peculiar combination, to say the least.

New York's "Richest" Rich.

New York has the richest baby, the richest boy, the richest bachelor, the richest spinster, the richest married man and the richest widow in the whole wide world. Parts of this list might be overthrown on close scrutiny, but we continually hear of John Nicholas Brown, the richest baby in the world; James Henry Smith, the richest bachelor; William C. Whitney, Jr., the richest boy; Miss Flagler, the richest spinster; Rockefeller, richest of all, etc.

"Humble" Swedish Royalty.

The so-called humble origin of the Swedish royal family has received a degree of attention lately from people who seem unaware that Bernadotte and present day representatives are allied by descent and marriage to several of the older reigning houses of Europe—Prince Gustavus Adolphus, now the husband of Connaught's son-in-law, is a great-grandson of the German emperor William I, and his ancestors also include King Gustavus II, of Sweden, the previous royal line, King George of England, grand dukes of Baden and highnesses of Bavaria and Wurtemburg.

Not long ago a foreign prince lost $60,000 in one night playing bridge whist in a swell London club. OUST THE DEMON.

A Tussle With Coffee.

There is something fairly demoniacal in the way coffee sometimes wreaks fiendish malice on those who use it. A lady writing from Calif. says:

"My husband and I, both lovers of coffee, suffered for some time from the most annoying form of nervousness, accompanied by most frightful headaches. In my own case there was finally developed some sort of affection of the nerves leading from the eyes to the head.

"I was unable to hold my head upright, the tension of the nerves drew it to one side, causing me the most intense pain. We got no relief from medicine, and were puzzled as to what caused the trouble, till a friend suggested that possibly the coffee we drank had something to do with it. We tried that we quit it and try Postum in Coffee.

"We followed his advice, and from the day that we began to use Postum we both began to improve, and in a very short time, both of us were entirely relieved. The nerves became steady once more, the headaches ceased, the muscles in the back of the neck relaxed, my head straightened up and the dreadful pain that had accompanied me while I used the old kind of coffee vanished.

"We have never resumed the use of the old coffee, but relish our Postum every day as well as we did the former beverage. And we are delighted to find that we can [illegible] it freely. My children also, [illegible] to do with the coffee and of their own accord [illegible] Name given by [illegible] Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

They need w[illegible] of strength. Their wills are weak [illegible] must be reinforced. They need to [illegible] inoculated with courage, and the p[illegible] to resist evil.

Very few of us realize how [illegible] help there is in a handshake [illegible] given in a brotherly way. One of [illegible] Hampton's officers when commanded [illegible] on some perilous duty, lingered [illegible] moment, as if afraid, and then [illegible] "Let me have one clasp of your [illegible] stammering hand before I go, and [illegible] I can do it." The majority of [illegible] only ones of earth ask not for [illegible] more, but for our sympathy, and [illegible] assuredly we ought to give. [illegible] we ought to do it, but why should [illegible] it be turned into the sacra[illegible] sentiment. "Some one ought to [illegible] so why not I?" Frederick Dou[illegible] once related the spirit which Lin[illegible] always gave him when they met [illegible] Douglass said: "He is the only [illegible] who does not remind me that I [illegible] negro." To say to a weak brother [illegible] all the meaning in your soul—"Be [illegible] good courage," will often make h[illegible] stand giant and suffer him to [illegible] has difficulties and his short[illegible] There are very few persons [illegible] do not need words of encouragement [illegible] who do not need to have some one [illegible] to them, "Be of good courage."

No one has ever been able to [illegible] this word with such genius as [illegible] and no hearts have ever been lifted [illegible] the presence of their best selves [illegible] those to whom He spoke. When [illegible] woman was brought to Him tak[illegible] in sin, it was "Go sin no m[illegible] more." Even the scribes could not condemn the [illegible] who stole her way into the hou[illegible] to see the prophet Jesus" [illegible] said, "She hath done what [illegible] could." [illegible] the cross threw his [illegible] upon Jesus' compassion, the [illegible] said, "Today thou shalt be next [illegible] Paradise."

Something Extra.

It is not enough, according to [illegible] Century, to be as good as the [illegible] yet many seem to think so. It is [illegible] to overcome the childish habit of [illegible] pairing ourselves with others, and [illegible] ing what comfort we can from [illegible] thought that we are not any [illegible] than they.

Jesus said, "[illegible] to be more [illegible] others." [illegible] it is any [illegible] now at all. [illegible] religions are [illegible] not say that [illegible] it says that [illegible] gether with [illegible] first came to [illegible] are made, [illegible] bruised reed [illegible] not to [illegible] smoking flax [illegible] does not [illegible] The first He [illegible] does not [illegible] it may become [illegible] to bind up, [illegible] second He [illegible] strongest possible the second He [illegible] into a flame. Christ says to all [illegible] "You are My disciples indeed [illegible] you become [illegible] and that God intended [illegible] to be. Do not remain in the [illegible] Do not be contented with [illegible] place life. Come upon the [illegible] Me. Live the separated life. Be [illegible] thing extra."—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR SEPTEMBER 10

Subject: The Life Giving Stream, Ezek. xlvii., 3-5—Golden Text, Rev. xxii., 17—Memory Verses, 3-5—Commentary on the Day's Lesson.

1. The source and progress of the gospel (vs. 1-5). 1. "Again." Now follows another vision to inspire hope and faith in the exiles, to lead them to prepare by a right life for their return, attracted by the blessings yet to come upon the land, contrasted with their sad condition in exile. "The house." The temple. "The waters," etc. The natural fact on which this conception rests is this, that there was a fountain connected with the temple hill, the waters of which fell into the valley east of the city, and made their way toward the sea. This was the only natural fountain stream flowing from Jerusalem. It was a small stream, whose soft-flowing waters were already regarded as a symbol of the silent and unobtrusive influence of the divine presence in Israel (Isa. 8:6). The waters of this stream flowed eastward, but they were too scanty to have any appreciable effect on the fertility of the region through which they passed. "South side of the altar." The stream flowed not only from the temple, but apparently from the holy of holies, and flowed close by the altar of sacrifice.

2. "Ran out," etc. This stream is a symbol of the miraculous transformation which the land of Canaan is to undergo in order to fit it for the habitation of Jehovah's ransomed people. The waters did not come to the temple, as if intended for the purpose of washing the sacrifices, but they issued from it, and proceeded to refresh and fertilize other places.

3, 4. "The man." The angel described in chapter 40:3. "Measured," etc. There is no special significance to the exact distance, but only to the fact that gradually the river broadened and deepened as it flowed toward the sea. "Ancles—knees," etc. This may be applied to the gradual discoveries of the plan of salvation. 1. In the patriarchal ages. 2. In the giving of the law. 3. In the ministry of John the Baptist. 4. In the full manifestation of Christ by the Holy Ghost. Or this vision may be applied to the growth of a believer in the grace and knowledge of God; or to the discoveries a penitent believer receives of the mercy of God in his salvation; it is also a type of the progress of Christianity. 5. "Waters to swim in." The small rill, starting from the temple, is a type of the gospel as it spreads and deepens among all the nations of the earth, transforming the desert into a Garden of Eden.

II. The power and efficacy of the gospel (vs. 6-12). 7. "Many trees." So long as the beholder, the prophet, followed the measurer, the angel, he saw nothing of the trees on the bank. The looking forward gave Ezekiel the knowledge of the progressive fulness and depth of the waters; not until he looks back does he come to know the fertilizing, enlivening effect of these waters.

8. "Into the desert." The Arabah, the valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea extending south to the Red Sea. The country between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea is the most desolate and inhospitable tract in the whole country. "Into the sea." The Dead Sea, the waters of which are so impregnated with various salts that no fish or animal can live in them. "Waters shall be healed." Restored to the proper condition, made healthful. This is typical of the work of the Holy Spirit.

9. "Everything—shall live." Life and salvation shall continually accompany the preaching of the gospel; the death of sin being removed, the life of righteousness shall be brought in. "Multitude of fish." The Dead Sea has become a sea of life. Out of death there arises, by the grace of God, a rich life. The sea is a symbol of the world; accordingly men appear as the living creatures in the sea, as the fishes. Hitherto they were only dead fishes, unspiritual, unsaved men.

10. In this verse we are told that the fishers shall stand from one end of the sea to the other and catch many fish.

11. The miry places and marshes shall not be healed, but shall be given to salt. Those not reached by the healing waters of the gospel through their sloth and earthly-mindedness are given over to their own bitterness and barrenness. The gospel is the only healing medicine for the disorders of our fallen nature, and they who will not receive it in the love of it remain incurable and are abandoned to final ruin. The salt comes into consideration here, not as seasoning, but as the type of fertility, life and prosperity. The thought is this: Only those who bar themselves against the gracious stream of divine love and are unwilling to regain health are henceforth to be given over to the curse, continuing to exist as monuments thereof. Around the sea of death there lingers on a death unto death.

12. "Trees for meat." Salvation must present itself for the terribly sick heathen world, above all, in the form of saving grace. Besides the nourishing fruits, therefore, are named also the healing leaves. The figure of the fishes refers to the extent, the greatness of the community; this figure of the trees to its nature, in so far as the divine grace transforms it into truly living members, who themselves bear rich fruit and thereby become a means of life and recovery to others also. "Fruit according to his months." This signifies a constant disposition, desire, resolution and endeavor to bear fruit, not in their own wisdom, power or goodness, or any goodness in themselves, but by the continual supplies of divine grace. Whoever may be the instrument of planting them, it is divine grace which gives the increase.

Killed by Lightning.

Humboldt, Tenn.—On Friday during an electric storm in Gadsden, Tenn., Dee Brown was killed instantly and his brother George was shocked by lightning. The men were seated under a tree at the time.

The accident was most unfortunate, as they were the sons of a widow. The one killed was about 25 years old while his brother was younger.

Father of European Royalty.

James I of England and VI of Scotland, from whom nearly all the royalties of Europe descend, inherited sovereignty through his mother, Mary Queen of Scots. His father, Lord Darnley, was the son of Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lenox, and Margaret, the daughter of Queen Margaret Tudor, widow of James IV of Scotland, and her second husband, Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus. In the royal collection at Windsor castle is a portrait of Archibald, who was the head of the second branch of Douglas and grandson of the famous earl, "Bell the Cat." He was a man of handsome person and reckless and unprincipled character.

Author's Experience With Fire.

Horatio F. Brown, a London writer on Ventian subjects, has had a singular experience with fire. The original draft of Brown's first and well-known work, "Life on the Lagoons," perished in the blaze which destroyed the office of its publisher, Kegan Paul, in 1883. The manuscript of his "Study in the Venetian Inquisition" was burned in a mail car in Switzerland two years later, and a similar fate overtook both of his "Calendar of Venetian State Papesh" at the fire at Spottiswoode's in 1892 and that of his "Studies in Archaeology." The latter was consumed in the burning of Cecil Rhodes' house, Rondesbosch, Capt Town, in 1895.

Odd Visiting Cards.

Korean visiting cards sometimes measure a foot square. The savages of Dahomey announce an intended visit by sending in advance a wooden board or the branch of a tree artistically carved. When the visit is paid the "card" is returned to the possession of its owner, who will doubtless use it for many years. With the natives of Sumatra the visiting card is composed of a piece of wood about a foot long, decorated with a bunch of straw and a knife.

CUTICURA GROWS HAIR

Scalp Cleared of Dandruff and Hair Restored by One Box of Cuticura and One Cake of Cuticura Soap.

A. W. Taft, of Independence, Va., writing under date of Sept. 15, 1904, says: "I have had falling hair and dandruff for twelve years and could get nothing to help me. Finally I bought one box of Cuticura Ointment and one cake of Cuticura Soap, and they cleared my scalp of the dandruff and stopped the hair falling. Now my hair is growing as well as ever. I highly prize Cuticura Soap as a toilet soap. (Signed) A. W. Taft, Independence, Va."

Matsuchendo, the ringleader of the Potemkine mutineers, is thus described in the Neue Freie Fresse: "This 'bloodthirsty' mutineer possesses the naivette and the smile of a little child. In his eyes you may read the melancholy of the steppes and the dreaminess of the woods. He never speaks of his aged mother, who lives in a small Russian village, without tears in his eyes. He presented every member of the Potemkine's crew with a souvenir and was heartbroken at the failure of his plans."

Titled Engine Driver.

Probably the only occasion on which a titled lady acted as engine driver was when the Marchioness of Tweeddaale drove the engine of the first train that crossed the new Forth bridge. Notwithstanding its enormous length and the keen wind that was blowing in her face the marchioness carried out her self-imposed task, and was congratulated on the uniform speed that she maintained.

THE IDEAL WIFE

Shapes the Destiny of Men—The Influence of a Healthy Woman Cannot Be Overestimated.

Seven-eighths of the men in this world marry a woman because she is beautiful in their eyes—because she has the qualities which inspire admiration, respect and love.

There is a beauty in health which is more attractive to men than mere regularity of feature. The influence of women glorious in the possession of perfect physical health upon men and upon the civilization of the world could never be measured. Because of them men have attained the very heights of ambition; because of them even thrones have been established and destroyed.

What a disappointment, then, to see the fair young wife's beauty fading away before a year passes over her head! A sickly, half-dead-and-alive woman, especially when she is the mother of a family, is a damper to all joyousness in the home, and a drag upon her husband.

The cost of a wife's constant illness is a serious drain upon the funds of a household, and too often all the doctoring does no good.

If a woman finds her energies are flagging, and that everything tires her, dark shadows appear under her eyes, her sleep is disturbed by horrible dreams; if she has backache, headaches, bearing-down pains, nervousness, whites, irregularities, or despondency, she should take means to build her system up at once by a tonic with specific powers, such as Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

This great remedy for women has done more in the way of restoring health to the women of America than all other medicines put together. It is the safeguard of woman's health.

Following we publish, by request, a letter from a young wife.

Mrs. Bessie Ainsley of 611 South 10th Street, Tacoma, Wash., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"Ever since my child was born I have suffered, as I hope few women ever have, with inflammation, female weakness, bearing-down pains, backache and wretched headaches. It affected my stomach so that I could not enjoy my meals, and half my time was spent in bed.

"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound made me a well woman, and I feel so grateful that I am glad to write and tell you of my marvelous recovery. It brought me health, new life and vitality."

What Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound did for Mrs. Ainsley it will do for every woman who is in poor health and ailing.

Its benefits begin when its use begins. It gives strength and vigor from the start, and surely makes sick women well and robust.

Remember Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound holds the record for the greatest number of actual cures of woman's ills. This fact is attested to by the thousands of letters from grateful women which are on file in the Pinkham laboratory. Merit alone can produce such results.

Women should remember that a cure for all female diseases actually exists, and that cure is Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Take no substitute.

If you have symptoms you don't understand write to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., for special advice—it is free and always helpful.

Current Events Gathered as They Happen.

A Shooting Scrape.

Selma, Ala.—On Thursday afternoon in the southern part of the city across the railroad, there took place a shooting scrape between Pearle Tate and Jesse Moore, negro boys, and Clifford Jenkins, a white boy.

Jenkins drives a delivery wagon for a soda water factory, and a few days ago he was annoyed by several negro boys. Thursday when he made his rounds he carried a pistol with him, and when he drove up to the store where he had the previous difficulty, the two negro boys were waiting for him. A quarrel ensued between Jenkins and Moore, and Jenkins pulled his pistol and shot Moore, inflicting a painful, but not dangerous, wound.

Pearle Tate, the other negro boy, then pulled his pistol and began shooting at Jenkins. One of the balls entered Jenkins's right thigh and another the calf of his right leg. Neither wound is serious. After shooting Jenkins, Tate made his escape.

The new quarantine regulations were extended so as to cover the entire state of Mississippi, with the exception of Meridian and points between that city and Selma, on the Southern railway. Quarantine was established against Natchez a few days ago when the fever broke out in that place, but as the fever is spreading so rapidly it was thought best to place the entire state of Mississippi, with the exception of Meridian and intermediate points, under the ban.

Memphis, Tenn., was also placed under the ban, and no one from that city will be allowed in Selma unless he can exhibit a health certificate which proves that he has been away from there at least five days. A strict quarantine has also been established against Pensacola and no one from that city will be llowed to come direct to Selma. These stringent quarantine regulations are being established in the hope that the plague will not spread to this city.

Montgomery, Ala.—Ed Jones, a negro from Autauga county, is in the Montgomery county jail charged with attempting to commit murder at Madison Park, eight miles from the city, late Tuesday night.

It is said the wife of Jones left him in Autauga county and went to live with her father, Louis Phillips, at Madison Park. Jones came to Montgomery Tuesday and went out to Madison Park late that night and engaged in a fight with Phillips. When he fired his pistol Phillips rushed in on him and the wife of Phillips struck him down with a heavy piece of wood. The Phillips family securely bound him with a rope and brought him to Montgomery.

As the negroes came into Montgomery with Jones he escaped from them. They reported his escape to police headquarters and Patrolmen Avant and Cantey soon had Jones under arrest. He was locked up at police headquarters about 2:30 o'clock Thursday morning.

Yesterday Jones was committed to the county jail to await a preliminary hearing before Justice M. H. Screws.

Sudden Death.

Selma, Ala.—Thursday morning shortly before 7 o'clock at his home on Mabry street the body of P. H. Norris, one of this city's best known citizens, was found cold in death lying on his bed. The wife of the deceased had gone into his room to awake him for his breakfast and after calling him repeatedly she went over to the bed to shake her husband when she discovered that while he slept the angel of death had come. He had evidently been dead about two hours when discovered, as his body was perfectly rigid and cold.

Second Mule Market.

Montgomery, Ala.—Montgomery, the south's second mule market, finds its market for mules and live stock throughout Alabama, parts of Georgia, Mississippi, Florida, and not a few have been shipped to the West Indies. Between 8,000 and 9,000 of the long-eared animals were sold by Montgomery dealers in live stock during the past year.

Thieves Captured.

Huntsville, Ala.—A telephone message from Scottsboro announces the capture of the negro man and woman who assaulted and robbed J. T. O'Neal, a prominent planter, near Huntsville, a few days ago. The prisoners will be brought here at once. The man and woman assaulted Mr. Neal while he was alone in his peach orchard and he had to make a desperate fight to keep from being slashed up with a razor in the man's hands. The couple took $45 out of Mr. Neal's pockets.

Jackson Registration.

Jackson, Tenn.—The registration in Jackson shows 2,090 names, the largest in the history of Jackson, though it is nothing like a full registration of the voters.

Historical Society Formed.

Columbia, Tenn.—The Maury County Historical Society was organized Friday night and a committee appointed to apply for a charter.

Barbecue at Mt. Zion.

Decatur, Ala.—One of the biggest barbecues ever given in this section of the State took place at Mt. Zion, this county, about ten miles west of here, Thursday. The barbecue was given by the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, and was attended by fully 2,000 people. About 150 people attended from the Decaturs.

During the day several speeches were made by prominent men of the state on vital questions affecting the people one way or the other. The first speaker was State Senator S. A. Lynne, who spoke on the subject of "Education and the Junior O. U. A. M." His speech was well received. Hon. B. B. Comer, chairman of the State Railroad Commission, addressed the vast audience on the subject of "The Resources of the State Education and the Junior Order." Mr. Coher did not say that he would be a candidate for governor, but he intimated as much in the course of his remarks.

Enforces Quarantine.

Demopolis, Ala.—On Thursday morning the board of mayor and council held a meeting and settled the differences existing between that body and the board of health since Quarantine Officer G. G. Griffin was removed from the trains without the appointment of a substitute, and it was ordered that an officer be at once put on the trains, Carney Devlin being appointed to the place. An ordinance was passed placing a rigid quarantine against Mississippi—Meridian excepted — Louisiana, Pensacola, and all infected sections. It was also ordered that, in addition to a certificate from a health officer, a certificate from the mayor or a justice of the peace will be required for parties coming to Demopolis.

Selma-Raised English Walnuts.

Selma, Ala.—C. W. Harrison, a well-known negro, presented Thursday to a number of citizens some English walnuts that he had raised at his home at 203 St. Phillip street. The walnuts are above the average size of those purchased in stores and have a good taste.

The tree, which is a young one, is bearing a good crop this year, but as it grows older the output will be greater. The tree grows without much trouble and in a few years there will be a number of such trees bearing fruit in and around Selma.

Election Ordered.

Greenville, Ala.—At a recent meeting of the commissioners of the county, an election was ordered to take place on the 9th of October to vote on levying a school tax. There is scarcely a doubt that the tax will be levied and Butler county added to the long column of counties which are endeavoring to eliminate illiteracy.

Will Outline His Platform.

Montgomery, Ala.—Lieutenant Governor R. M. Cunningham spent Thursday in Montgomery. He took occasion to tell the newspaper men who asked him about politics that in a short while he would make a public address in which he would declare his principles and outline his platform in his race for Governor of Alabama.

Close of Year.

Montgomery, Ala.—Another business year began Friday. It is natural for those who live in the cotton region to date their commercial year from September 1, when the great staple is fairly making its way to market. Very little cotton reaches Montgomery during the month of August, but for several months to come the weekly receipts here will be heavy.

The prospect of a very large yield of cotton in the Montgomery territory proper was very flattering until about one month ago. Since then a number of causes have operated to cut off expectations and no one now expects receipts for the current year to equal those of the year which expired last night.

Huntsville Celebrates.

Huntsville, Ala.—At the weekly prayer service of the Dallas Avenue Baptist church the advent of peace and the end of the bloody and destructive war between Russia and Japan was celebrated. Rev. H. E. Rice, the pastor, read appropriate quotations from the scriptures bearing on the subject and R. E. Pettus made an address relative to the peace terms.

Citizens at Work.

Montgomery, Ala.—The special sanitary committee, composed of the aldermen of the city and twenty-one citizens, organized Thursday night in the council chamber and started out to do something to prevent yellow fever from reaching Montgomery.

Russian Settlers.

Panama.—Fifty Russian families left Panama Thursday afternoon for Chiriqui. Arrangements have been made by which the same number of Russian families will be settled every month in different portions of the republic. The government gives each family $500 and thirty acres of land.

'Squire Hows' Thirteenth.

Bellvieu, Tenn.—John C. Hows, of this (the Fourteenth) district, a member of the Davidson county court, is the father of thirteen children, all living. The thirteenth child was born the 13th day of the present month, the thirteenth hour of the day, and weighed thirteen pounds. The physician who delivered the child lived about thirteen miles away, in the Thirteenth district.

YELLOW FEVER NEWS.

The Latest Reports From the Infected District.

New Orleans.—The fever situation at 6 p. m. Monday was as follows: New cases, 55; total cases to date, 2,079; deaths, 5; total deaths to date, 292; new foci, 16; cases under treatment, 318; discharged, 1,469.

The number of new cases reported today is such a jump from the daily reports of the past week that it naturally causes some comment, but it is accounted for by the fact that several physicians whose names had not appeared on the list very frequently heretofore were all there today. The arrest and confinement of Dr. Berge on account of failing to report three cases is believed to have had its effect on others who were only reporting severe cases with the result that not only all cases of yellow fever were reported, but many cases which were distinctly not yellow fever were put on the suspicious list.

Outside Cases.

Reports from the country showed that the physicians there were busy also. Dr. Brady, the medical inspector of the state board, reported that many country physicians were not reporting mild cases of yellow fever, and he urged the state board to take action by urging them to report all cases, and not wait for black vomit or marked jaundice to form a diagnosis.

Following are the reports:

Patterson—Nine cases; one death on Waveland plantation.

Lake Providence—Three cases, one death.

St. Bernard Parish—One case near Slaughter house.

Jefferson Parish—Kenner, three cases, two deaths.

Hanson City—Four cases.

McDonoghville—Three cases; Clark Cheniere, two deaths.

Terre Bonne Parish—Moise settlement, five cases; Bell grove, four cases; Aerdoyne, one case; Crescent farm, four cases; Bayou Terre Bonne, one case.

St. Rose—Seven cases.

Pecan Grove—Two cases.

Prospect plantation—One case.

La Place—St. John, seven cases last report.

Amelia—Eight new cases; Boeuf, two new cases.

Gulfport, Miss.—Five new cases.

Mississippi City—Two new cases.

Vicksburg—Two new cases.

Dr. Souchon received a report from Dr. Tabor of a suspicious case at Louisville, in the northern part of Caddo parish, and Dr. Schumpert, the health officer of Shreveport, is investigating.

New Causes Contribute.

New causes contributed to an increase in the number of new cases Monday. One was the fact that there is never a complete clean-up of cases on Sunday, leaving some to find their way into the Monday list, and the other was the arrest and incarceration of Dr. Philip Berge, a physician of standing, on a charge of having failed to report two Chartres street cases.

Dr. Berge was taken from his house about midnight on Saturday, on his return from his day's work, and was not paroled until Sunday afternoon, spending fourteen hours in a cell. Rather than undergo a similar experience physicians were particularly prompt today in reporting cases, seventeen of them appearing in person early in the day at Dr. White's office. Not all of the cases reported are likely to develop actually into yellow fever, but the doctors have evidently decided to err on the side of excessive caution, if they err at all. Dr. Berge, in the meantime, insists that his failure to get his information to Dr. White's office was unintentional. He communicated it to the emergency hospital. When arraigned today the doctor was released on a nominal bond.

Opposed to Moving Day.

Dr. White and the advisory committee of the New Orleans Medical Society today sent a letter to the mayor in connection with the near approach of "moving day," October 2, and urge that the general movement be postponed thirty days on account of the danger of infection.

Many View Labor Day Parade.

The hopefulness of the situation among the public at large was manifested in the large crowds which viewed the labor parade Monday.

An immense picnic followed the parade. Much of the enthusiasm was due to the fact that the situation is now believed to be well in hand.

Hereafter no patients will be sent to the old hospital, and those there now and able to be moved will be taken to the new.

The announcement that Mobile had raised the quarantine against Atlanta and that Mississippi would impose none gave satisfaction here. Numbers of New Orleans people have relatives in Mobile or along the gulf coast, and they have been undergoing detention at Atlanta in order to reach these points. Quarantine against Atlanta would have stopped them from doing so in the future.

Spreading Along Gulf Coast.

Jackson, Miss.—Yellow fever is spreading steadily along the gulf coast. Five new cases were reported from Gulfport and two from Mississippi City Monday night.

Precautions Redoubled in Atlanta.

Atlanta, Ga.—J. C. Caruthers, who arrived from Pensacola last Friday, and who was removed to the detention hospital with a well-developed case of yellow fever, was reported Monday to be improving satisfactorily. No other arrivals with fever have been reported, and with the precautions that have been redoubled since Caruthers arrived, no more are expected. The quarantine against Atlanta, which was announced by several cities, has been removed in all but one or two instances.

The promised issue between the city, county and state board officials has not materialized, and since the refusal of Atlanta to quarantine against infected points, it does not appear likely that an attempt will be made by the state board to override this decision.

Seven Cases in Vicksburg.

Vicksburg, Miss.—Up to 6 o'clock Monday evening two new cases of yellow fever had been reported, making a total of seven. Three patients were discharged. Both new cases are white, living in widely separated localities.

Natchez Greatly Encouraged.

Natchez, Miss.—With only four cases of yellow fever to report Monday Dr. Lavinder feels greatly encouraged over the local situation.

Assistant Surgeon General Goldberger has reported to the Washingtno medical authorities that there are no cases of yellow fever in Memphis.

Four new cases of yellow fever developed in Pensacola on Monday.

Marion College to Open.

Marion, Ala.—The educational activity of Marion will be resumed next Thursday, the 7th, by the opening of the session of the Marion Military Institute. The public school, the Judson and the seminary will soon open their doors also. The expectation of all the schools is for the largest attendance in their history. The Marion Military institute has increased its power of accommodation during the summer by the addition of a new building and home, which will be occupied by Prof. and Mrs. Kellogg, and students who are taking classical studies more largely. Prof. and Mrs. Kellogg will arrive from Michigan Monday. The appointment of Prof. C. C. Johnson, principal of the public school, to the office of county superintendent has met with universal approval. The work of the county board will be greatly aided by the appointment of such an efficient teacher and executive to this important post.

To Rejuvenate Commercial Club.

Jasper, Ala.—A very enthusiastic meeting of the Commercial Club was held Friday night. The meeting was well attended and it was decided to incorporate the club and issue stock to the different members. L. B. Musgrove has promised a donation of $100, provided the remainder of the club's indebtedness can be raised, and it is now certain that the expense of fitting up the rooms will be met at an early date. All the members were delighted with the results of the meeting, and it is now thought that the club will take on new life and become active in the development of Jasper and the Jasper district.

Objects to Rural Carriers.

Huntsville, Ala.—From Marshall county comes news of the arrest of C. J. Matthews, an aged countryman, who is opposed to the rural free delivery system, on a charge of obstructing the roads along a rural mail route. In his trial before a commissioner, the old man admitted that he had cut down trees to prevent the passage of the mail man. He was placed under bond of $1,000 to appear before the next federal grand jury in Huntsville.

Severe Storm in Florence.

Florence, Ala.—Florence was visited by a severe thunder storm shortly after noon Saturday, rain falling in torrents for about two hours. An electric car on the Sheffield line was struck by lightning, but none of the passengers were hurt. Two ladies who attempted to use telephones were knocked down by the lightning, but neither was severely injured.

Revision of Freight Rates.

The Interstate Commerce Commission ordered a revision of freight rates between Memphis, Tenn., and points in Arkansas.

Palace For Miss Roosevelt.

The Empress Dowager of China has prepared a palace for Miss Roosevelt to live in while her guest in Pekin.

Killed by a King.

Honolulu.—While in Honolulu this week E. H. Harriman, the railway magnate, made inquiries regarding one Charles Neilson, who was shot by King Kamehameha, the Fifth, and was an uncle of Harriman. The railway man expressed himself as anxious to meet some one who had known Neilson and tell about him, but no such person was found.

The killing is referred to in Hawaiian histories. It took place in Lahaina in 1859. Neilson was secretary to the king, and the latter, who was a heavy drinker, conceived the idea that the secretary was in too high favor with the queen.

While under the influence of liquor he shot Neilson, inflicting wounds which eventually proved fatal. The tragedy is stated to have so weighed on the king's mind that he was never the same and offered to abdicate and died soon afterward.

A Reported Dead Man Is Alive.

Rome, Ga.—The dispatches from New Orleans Thursday night stated that George Clement, of Rome, United States vice-consul at Puerto Cortez, died there a few days ago of yellow fever. Consul Clement is not dead, but is here visiting his parents and is well and hearty. Mr. Clement said the story must have grown out of the fact that his brother, Clifton Clement, died there in May last. Mr. Clement has leave of absence till fall, when he will return to his post in South America.

Delightful Detention Camp.

Dallas, Tex.—A novelty in the way of a detention camp has been put into effect by the Missouri, Kansas and Texas railway at the Red river bridge near Denison. The camp consists of two chair cars, run on spur tracks, in charge of a chair car porter, a kitchen car with an expert cook, a dining car and a caboose fitted up with a bath tub and supplied with soap and towels. Ice is supplied, and every luxury of modern travel has been supplied. Water is furnished by a private water car.

This action of the railway was taken in order to promote the comfort of those who might have been taken off trains, and none but its own passengers will be allowed the use of the camp.

Casualties in a Wreck.

Augusta, Ga.—City Policeman F. J. Murphy, acting as quarantine officer, was killed; Flagman George J. Lott so badly injured that he died at the hospital shortly after, and three others were slightly injured in a wreck of a Southern Railway train on its way to Charleston within the city limits here on Wednesday.

Indebtedness Is Paid.

New York.—The announcement was made on Thursday by the officers of the Equitable Life Assurance Society that the indebtedness to the society of the Depew Improvement Company was paid Thursday afternoon, the principal and interest amounting to $293,850.82. The correspondence incident to the transaction was also, at the suggestion of President Paul Morton, made public, to the end, Mr. Morton said, that an impression unjust to Senator Chauncey M. Depew might be removed.

Arm Broken.

Gadsden, Ala.—Josephine Johnson, the 13-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. P. While playing she fell and struck her arm on a brick, breaking it between the wrist and elbow.

WILD DISORDER

Entire Oil District is Wiped Out by Fire Kindled by Revengeful Tarters.

MANY KILLED IN COLD BLOOD

City Officials Flee for Their Lives as City Is Under Martial Law—Telegraphs Destroyed.

Baku, Caucasus.—The situation here Thursday night shows no signs of amelioration. It could hardly be worse. The terror-stricken inhabitants are fleeing from the city, knowing that the garrison is utterly inadequate to protect them, and although the worst scenes of fire and massacre have not yet occurred in Baku its citizens dare to think how far the excesses may proceed.

The entire oil and commercial quarters of Balakhan, Sabunto and Nobel have been wiped out by fire, and the inhabitants remaining behind were massacred and thrown into the flames. Bybiebat continues to burn, and is threatened with the same fate as Balakhan.

The consulates, banks and commercial buildings are guarded by troops. All of the English residents and almost all other inhabitants of the better class have boarded steamers and gone to sea to escape from danger. All available steamers have been employed for this purpose.

Martial Law Proclaimed.

Martial law has been proclaimed in the city. Nobody is allowed on the streets after 8 o'clock at night. Inhabitants of houses are held strictly responsible for shots fired from them. Artillery was employed against one house from which shots were fired. The walls were breached, the house was stormed and all the people found there were killed. There is a general state of terror in the city. A whole army of factory workmen, driven in from the burning districts, has flocked into the city. There is the greatest destitution and measures for transporting the workmen from the city are imperatively necessary.

Reinforcements of troops are arriving daily, and it is hoped the authorities soon will have the situation better in hand.

Following is a brief review of the consequence of the events of the last few days, as witnessed at Baku:

On the afternoon of Saturday reports began running from mouth to mouth that the Tartars and Armenians were massacreing each other. Immediately there was great excitement and a panic prevailed. Stores were closed and windows and doors barricaded. Twenty minutes later the sounds of rifle firing were heard in the various quarters of the city. Then everybody wished to flee, but no one could tell whether safety lay within or without the city.

Two hours later patrols of soldiers and other soldiers armed with rifles began to arrive from the barracks, and these troops immediately fired upon the rioters.

The firing between the warring factions continued all Saturday night. On Sunday the situation showed little improvement, and firing was in progress all during the day, the shooting deserted except for the combatants.

Reports of Massacres.

No one dared to leave his house during the day. A carriage, escorted by Cossacks, conveyed the city authorities to the house of the military general. At 8 o'clock on Sunday evening the first reflection on the sky of fire in the "black town" quarter was noticed, and it was learned that the Nobel oil reservoirs were burning. Sunday night was more fearful than the preceding one. Fires were raging in several quarters and the shooting by the troops was uninterrupted.

Fires also broke out in the suburbs of Balakhan and Sabunto. All telegraphic communication between these points were destroyed, and it was impossible to ascertain the extent of the burning on Monday morning. Many of the inhabitants decided to risk the danger in an effort to escape from the city. They went in cabs escorted by Cossacks to the railroad station, and the flight from the city became general, everybody who could manage to do so leaving. By this time cabs had became scarce and prices were soaring. On Monday night the burning, shooting, killing and looting continued and a refinery was in flames beyond Bybiebat. Flames filled the sky in that direction.

A big wood yard in Baku caught fire and a strong wind fanned the flames which soon spread to the circus and adjacent houses. The fire continued all of Tuesday and broke out in several new places, embracing the railroad station and a

MANY KILLED IN COLD BLOOD.

City Officials Flee for Their Lives and City Is Under Martial Law—Telegraphs Destroyed.

Baku, Caucasus.—The situation here Thursday night shows no signs of amelioration. It could hardly be worse. The terror-stricken inhabitants are fleeing from the city, knowing that the garrison is utterly inadequate to protect them, and although the worst scenes of fire and massacre have not yet occurred in Baku itself, some dare to think how far the excesses may proceed.

The entire oil and commercial quarters of Balakhan, Sabunto and Nomani have been wiped out by fire, and the inhabitants remaining behind were massacred and thrown into the flames. Bybiebat continues to burn, and is threatened with the same fate as Balakhan.

The consulates, banks and commercial buildings are guarded by troops. All of the English residents and almost all other inhabitants of the better class have boarded steamers and gone to sea to escape from danger. All available steamers have been employed for this purpose.

Martial Law Proclaimed.

Martial law has been proclaimed in the city. Nobody is allowed on the streets after 8 o'clock at night, and inhabitants of houses are held strictly responsible for shots fired from them. Artillery was employed against one house from which shots were fired. The walls were breached, the house was stormed and all the people inside were killed. There is a general panic in the city. A whole army of hungry workmen, driven in from the burning districts, has flocked into the city. There is the greatest destitution and measures for transporting the workmen from the city are imperatively necessary.

Reinforcements of troops are arriving daily, and it is hoped the authorities soon will have the situation better in hand.

Following is a brief review in sequence of the events of the last six days, as witnessed at Baku:

On the afternoon of Saturday last reports began running from mouth to mouth that the Tartars and Armenians were massacreing each other. Immediately there was great alarm and a panic prevailed. Stores were closed and windows and doors were barricaded. Twenty minutes later sounds of rifle firing were heard from the various quarters of the city, and everybody wished to flee, but no one could tell whether safety lay within or without the city.

Two hours later patrols of Cossacks and other soldiers armed with rifles began to arrive from the barracks, and these troops immediately engaged the rioters.

The firing between the warring factions continued all Saturday night. On Sunday the situation showed no improvement, and firing was in progress all during the day, the streets being deserted except for the combatants.

Reports of Massacres.

No one dared to leave his house during the day. A carriage, surrounded by Cossacks, conveyed the city authorities to the house of the governor general. At 8 o'clock on Sunday evening the first reflection on the sky of fire in the "black town" quarter was noticed, and it was learned that the Nobel oil reservoirs were burning. Sunday night was more fearful than the preceding one. Fires broke out in several quarters and the firing of the troops was uninterrupted.

Fires also broke out in the suburbs of Balakhan and Sabunto. Telegraphic communication between Baku and these points were destroyed, and it was impossible to ascertain what was burning on Monday morning. Many of the inhabitants decided to brave the danger in an effort to leave the city. Those went in cabs surrounded by Cossacks to the railroad station and the flight from the city soon became general, everybody who was able to do so leaving. By this time provisions had became scarce and prices were soaring. On Monday night the burning, shooting, killing and plundering continued and a refinery which was in flames beyond Bybiebat lit up the sky in that direction.

A big wood yard in Baku also caught fire and a strong wind fanned the flames which soon spread to Nikitin circus and adjacent houses. The fire continued all of Tuesday blazing out in several new places, embracing the railroad station and a number of Armenian houses in different quarters of the city.

No One Dares Leave House.

During Wednesday fugitives from Balakhan began to arrive here and told of the indescribable horrors they had witnessed.

All the oil wells there, they said, were in the hands of Tartars who were pillaging the houses of Russian and Armenian workmen, carrying away everything of value and burning the buildings. Ten thousand workmen they said would be left in poverty and they believe that Balakhan will be totally destroyed. At 5 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon the situation was somewhat quieter. Tartars and Armenians were running through the streets crying "peace" and a little later a procession made up of both races, with clergymen at its head, went through the town. But these efforts toward a cessation of the fighting were not effective, for it went on all Wednesday night. The soldiers continued their efforts to repress the disorders and by Thursday morning matters were more orderly everywhere.

Burned at the Stake.

Fort Worth, Tex.—A special from Waxahachie, Tex., tells of the burning Thursday night of Steve Davis, a young negro, who confessed to outraging Mrs. S. M. Norris, aged 20, last Saturday night.

The mob, consisting of 3,500 persons, tied the negro to a piece of gas pipe that had been set in the ground, piled fagots around him and set the mass on fire. The sufferings of the negro were of short duration, owing to the fierceness of the fire, which was fanned by a gale of wind which blew across the prairie. The husband of the woman is said to have set the match to the tinder and started the blaze that consumed the negro.

Davis was arrested last Tuesday and taken before the woman, who at that time was not sure that it was he. She had been desperately ill from her ordeal. On Thursday he was again taken before the woman, who on sight of him, fainted. When she revived she identified him, and his fate was sealed. The negro finally confessed, detailing the crime. This is the third negro that has been burned in this section of Texas within a short time. One of these was lynched at Sulphur Springs and another at Waco.

Will Pay Respects.

New York.—Baron Komura said Thursday that his coming interview with Secretary Root, which he expected would occur in New York city, would be purely a formal exchange of courtesies, and that their meeting had no other object. The baron denied emphatically the rumor that the Emperor of Japan had not yet given his approval to the peace treaty or that the powers of the Japanese plenipotentiaries were so limited that there was at this late hour still a possibility that the emperor would fail to ratify the treaty.

"The political disturbances in Tokio" he said, "can not in the slightest degree influence the emperor's determination to ratify the treaty when he receives an official copy of the document."

Baron Komura reiterated his opinion that the disturbances in Tokio were directed against the local branches of the government.

Send Off for Lee.

Chattanooga, Tenn. — Lieutenant Fitzhugh Lee, Jr., of the Twelfth cavalry, has left the army post here on a furlough, after which he will report at Washington as the social aide of President Roosevelt. Lieutenant Lee was given a rousing send-off by the officers of the Twelfth, with whom he was very popular.

The president's selection of Lieut. Lee places scions of two of the greatest families in America on duty at the white house. The president's other social aide is Lieutenant U. S. Grant, third grandson of the famous union general. Lieutenant Lee is a grand nephew of General Robert E. Lee.

Assassin Still at Large.

Wylam, Ala.—The negro who shot and killed Dock Anderson, a white man in this city, Thursday night, while the latter was on his way home from his work in the steel plant, at Ensley, has not yet been captured, but his name has been learned and the officers are hopeful of securing his arrest within a few days.

Throw Remains in Niagara Falls.

Cleveland, O.—The will of W. H. Baird, a well-known attorney and promoter who died several weeks ago here, which is being contested by his sister, Mrs. Anna E. Wadsworth, decrees that his ashes be placed in a glass receptable and thrown into Niaga Falls. Mr. Baird also directed that one-fourth of the income from his estate be used each year in the support of the propaganda of socialism. The value of the estate has not yet been made public.

ELEVATED WRECKED.

Twelve are Dead—Eight Killed and Four Died Soon—Many Injured.

A SWITCHMAN WAS ARRESTED.

Motorman Has Disappeared, But Other Trainmen Are Placed Under Arrest Charged With Negligence.

New York.—The death list of the accident on the Ninth avenue elevated railroad, when a car crowded with early morning workers on their way down town, pitched headlong into the street, stands at twelve. Three men are in hospitals with fractured skulls. One of these who as yet remains unidentified at Roosevelt hospital is unconscious and not expected to live. More than two score of persons were injured, many of them seriously.

The cause of the accident and the immediate responsibility remains to be seen. The motorman of the wrecked train is a fugitive, while a switchman is charged with manslaughter and the trainmen are held as witnesses. Coroner Schoeler, who has undertaken the work of fixing the blame for the wreck, announced that the switchman's bond had been placed at $5,000, and those of the witnesses at $100 each.

Train Takes Wrong Track.

Whatever may have caused the mistake, the accident, the worst in the history of overhead railroads in New York, came when a south-bound train on the Ninth avenue line was switched off to the Sixth avenue line at the Fifty-third street junction. The motorman, expecting a clear track on the direct line of Ninth avenue, or disregarding the warning signal that the switch was open, rushed his train along at a high rate of speed. The first car swung around the right angle curve, holding to the rails because of the weight of the train behind. Then the strain became too great. The couplings broke, the second car was whirled about almost end for end, and to the horror of those who looked on from below, pitched into the street.

Passengers in Jumbled Mass.

Those passengers who had not jumped from platforms and windows before the plunge came were thrown into a mass at the forward end of the car. As the injured men and women were struggling to free themselves, the heavy front trucks of the third car on the train above fell almost in their midst, as the car itself jumped nearly off the elevated structure and was wedged against a building at the southeast corner of Ninth avenue and Fifty-third street.

Almost every ambulance in Manhattan was summoned and the injured and dead were hurried away with all speed.

Three alarms of fire brought many engines to the scene. A slight fire caused by burning insulation was quickly extinguished, and the firemen set to work chopping out the dead and injured. The task was not an easy one, for the heavy car in falling had almost completely buried pedestrians in its wreckage. At least one was killed ought in this way, while Policeman Henry Atkens, who was standing directly under the elevated structure, is among those most seriously injured.

Eight persons were dead when taken out of the wreck and four died later at hospitals.

Switchman First Arrested.

The switchman in the tower at Ninth avenue and Fifty-third street, Cornelius A. Jackson, was first arrested. Then Conductor J. W. Johnson and Guards Higginson, J. McDavitt, W. L. Berry and B. Clark were taken into custody. At a preliminary hearing this afternoon all the men waived examination.

Two versions of the cause of the wreck were told to the coroner. One of these was that the switchman had set the tracks for a Sixth avenue train, and when he saw his mistake had attempted to rectify it, while the train was on the curve the change throwing the second, third and fourth cars off the track.

The switchman, however, declares the wrecked train had Sixth avenue signals set and he expected it to slow down to take the curve. Instead it maintained the speed usual with Ninth avenue trains on the direct line.

Efforts to Fix Blame.

Statements tending to fix the blame of the accident were made by officials of the company after several hours' investigation. E. P. Brown, vice president of the company, speaking for the switchmen who set the switch so that the train turned off on the avenue track at nearly a right angle to its natural course, made the following statement in Jackson's name:

"The Ninth avenue car which met with the accident displaced Sixth avenue signals. On the assumption that the signals were correct, I gave the train the Sixth avenue track."

General Manager Hedley, of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, said that after the wreck the switch was found set for a Sixth avenue train.

State Railway Commissioner Frank W. Baker made personal observation of the scene of the wreck today in order to have on hand any evidence which may be needed. Detectives learned that Motorman Paul Kelly spent a large part of the day at a friend's house, but he disappeared from that place before the police arrived to arrest him.

Tokio Troubles About Settled.

Tokio—Friday was almost without incident. Crowds collected at various points and made slight demonstrations against the police, but there was no disorder.

General Sakuma, who established his headquarters at the war office and directed the military operations and policing of the city from there, has withdrawn the guards from the foreign legations, which are deemed to be in no danger.

There have been no further demonstrations against Christian churches or missions. The situation in other cities is being watched. Apparently the trouble is not spreading. Anti-peace meetings held in many cities and towns are passing resolutions denouncing the settlement at Portsmouth, but are not interfered with unless they result in breaches of the peace. Premier Katsura's promise that there would be a session of the diet in October tends to improve the situation.

Nineteen Killed.

Connellsville, Pa.—The Rand powder mills at Fair Chance, six miles south of Connellsville, were entirely destroyed by an explosion at 5 o'clock Saturday afternoon. Thirty-two men were at work in the mills. Nineteen are known to be dead.

Scores of people in the town of Fair Chance were more or less painfully injured. The shock of the explosion was distinctly felt at Connellsville, twenty miles away, buildings being rocked on their foundations. At Uniontown hundreds of panes of glass were broken. In the town of Fair Chance there is scarcely a house that did not suffer damage. The rails of the Baltimore and Ohio railway and the West Pennsylvania Traction company were rooted from their bed and traffic delayed from four to six hours. Train No. 52 on the Baltimore and Ohio had a narrow escape from annihilation. It had just passed the mills when the explosion occurred. The windows of the coaches were shattered and the passengers thrown into a panic.

Recklessness the Cause.

Newcastle, Pa.—Recklessness was responsible for the Western New York and Pennsylvania wreck several miles north of this city Thursday morning according to the statement of Samuel Cox, fireman of the wrecked excursion train, to Coroner J. R. Cox.

Fireman Cox is reported to have said that "he understood the orders to be for the excursion train to stop at Graham's siding to allow south-bound regular passenger train No. 234 from Oil City to pass.. There was an interval of three minutes before it was due at Wilmington Junction, two miles north of Graham's, and Engineer Popham pulled out, thinking he could pass the regular train at that point. His failure to reach Wilmington Junction cost the lives of the engineer and fireman of No. 234, and may cause his own death. It also caused the fatal injury of one of his passengers and the severe injury of nearly fifty others.

Health Association.

New Orleans, La.—The New Orleans Health Association is now a permanent body. Its officers have been announced with Charles Janvier, President, and H. M. Mayo, Secretary.

Dr. J. H. White, surgeon in charge of the Federal forces, wrote President Janvier highly indorsing the organization, and suggesting that through its efforts, the city and state could forever be redeemed from the thraldom of epidemic disease.

French Vessel to Visit Mexico.

Mexico City.—A French cruiser, probably the Catinat, will visit Mexican ports early in October. Notification of this fact was received from Captain Hautefeuille, commander of the Pacific division. The communication was dated from Beunos Ayres.

Infernal Machine Is Thrown.

Tasastheus, Finland.—While the governor was driving Monday with the chief of police, an infernal machine was thrown at the carriage, but failed to explode.

YELLOW FEVER NEWS.

The Latest Reports From the Infected District.

New Orleans, La.—The report on yellow fever for the last twenty-four hours in this city is as follows: New cases, 38; total cases to date, 2,327; deaths, none; total deaths, 316; new foci, 18; case under treatment, 306; cases discharged, 1,711. This is the first day since the announcement of yellow fever that no deaths are reported. On same date in 1878 ninety deaths occurred.

Country Cases.

The most interesting feature of the country news was the report from the health office at St. John parish of the existence of about 25 cases at Lions, a lumber town in that parish, and his statement that the patients were not being properly cared for, and that they had been concealing the illness. He has taken charge of things there and today reported three new cases.

The health officer of Plaquemine reports a new case at St. Clair plantation, six miles above Woodlawn, where a nest was discovered last week.

Other country cases reported:

Edgard, St. John parish, new focus, three cases.

Kenner, five cases; one death.

Hanson City, two cases, one death.

Amelia, two cases.

Boeuf, one case.

St. Elizabeth plantation, one death.

Clark Cheniere, Jefferson parish, seven case.

St. Rose, one case.

Florenville, St. Tammany, imported case, died.

Patterson, nine cases.

McDonoghville, three cases.

Lake Providence, eight cases, one death.

Summary of Mississippi Situation.

Jackson, Miss.—The Missisippi yellow fever summary for the past twenty-four hours, ending at 8 o'clock, is as follows:

Gulfport, three new cases; Mississippi City, two new cases.

No new cases reported at Vicksburg, Natchez, Pearlington, Hansboro or Sharkey Countil.

No deaths occurred in the state.

Nine New Cases in Pensacola.

Pensacola, Fla.—Nine new cases and one death is the yellow fever record for Pensacola concluding at 6 o'clock, when the various physicians working in conjunction with the state board of health made their reports. Suspicious or doubtful cases number about twelve. The one death was that of A. Wolfing, vice consul of Norway, who died after a brief illness. He was taken ill five days ago and did not call in a physician, the case being located by inspectors.

Envoys Dined By President.

Oyster Bay.—With Baron Komura and Minister Takahira at luncheon Saturday and M. Witte and Baron De Rosen at dinner at night, President Roosevelt extended to the peace envoys of Japan and Russia his first official courtesies and expressed to them on behalf of the American people gratification that the labors of their mission to America have ended successfully.

The functions were the result of invitations extended by the president when the plenipotentiaries were first received on board the Mayflower. Baron Komura and Minister Takahira arrived at Oyster Bay on board the yacht Sylph, which had been sent to New York for them. They reached Sagamore Hill at 1 o'clock. The Japanese envoys remained with the president for two hours. Luncheon was served at 1:30, the envoys being entertained by the president and Mrs. Roosevelt. There were no other other guests. During and after the luncheon the president and his guests discussed thoroughly the details of the peace arrangements. Both Baron Komura and Minister Takahira expressed to the president their appreciation of his efforts, to which they attributed largely the success of the conference in reaching an agreement. A few minutes before 3 o'clock the Japanese envoys went aboard the Sylph, which sailed immediately for New York.

M. Witte and Baron De Rosen, the Russian plenipotentiaries, were the guests of the president and Mrs. Roosevelt at dinner Saturday evening. M. Witte's well-known antipathy to water induced the Russian envoys to make the trip to Oyster Bay by rail. M. Witte and Baron de Rosen remained with the president until 9:35 p. m.

Bolivar, Tenn.—F. M. Smith was unanimously elected by the mayor and board of aldermen superintendent and general manager of the light and water plant to be installed here. Mr. Smith has been for several years manager of the Memphis telephone exchange here.

A Little Gem

What have I did, dear Love, to thee
That thou dost doth so cruel to me?
Ain't I not good enough to be Thy thine at last?
By them alone stars upon the blue,
I think of thou, since thee are true,
For I hast many thoughts of you—.
I hast. I hast!

O never, never did I done
The sins you say not never none!
My spirits are completely skun.
My heart is bust.
Forsooth forsooth I am forsook
And my ambition hast been took,
Just see how sadly I dost look—
I dost, I dost!

How did I came to fle in love?
All that I hast I freely guv
Till every hope has been remuv
And set apart.
I wouldn't be so mean as paint
My life-long passion as it ain't—
But honest, I art wan and faint.
I art, I art!

HIS WIFE'S UNDERSTUDY

BY WALTER BROWN

(Copyright, 1905, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

John Morton's wife was the popular prima donna of a high-class light opera theater. Her stage name was—well, it was and is well known. She was the pet of the public, courted, flattered and feted as few others of the theatrical firmament ever have been. Yet she was a miserable woman.

Wealth, fame and admiration had been so freely lavished upon her that she was in a position to enjoy to the full that most cherished gratification of her sex, the jealous envy of all other professional women.

She had youth, beauty and diamonds galore. Flowers were flung at her nightly, and the daily newspapers told of her triumphs in flowery language.

Thousands of her photographs adorned the store windows and huge reproductions of her sweet smiling face made bright the bill posting stations. In spite of this she was wretched—so miserable that she had fully determined to end her life.

Not a whisper of scandal had ever assailed her stainless reputation. She had married a man whom she truly loved—a man of little or no ability, a colorless creature, but, by her influence, she had procured him the position of stage manager in the company in which she was the star.

By her own efforts and talents she had built up a luxurious home, which she illuminated with the radiance of her matronly dignity and the everlasting light of her gentle womanly love. Yet she had decided to kill herself, to die because another woman had usurped the place in her worthless husband's affection, which rightly belonged to her.

It was not that she was swayed by the vulgar passion called jealousy. It was rather that her loyal heart was wounded. Broken by the knowledge that the man to whom she had been true as steel deliberately sacrificed her love for the blandishments of a frivolous little chorus girl.

The glorious creature was so constituted that she never for a moment thought to revenge herself by slaying the wretch whom she had raised to affluence or his impudent accomplice. She thought only of self-sacrifice. She would die and leave him to his guilty conscience; leave her to the remorse of having wrecked a happy home.

There was one thing she could do, however. She could brand her rival with the authorship of the tragedy. She resolved to die in the chorus girl's pretty apartments. Those rooms, the constant haunt of her husband, maintained on the money the wronged wife earned. The baby-faced girl had triumphed over her life. Hers should be the triumph of death. By dying in her rival's home she would bring upon the shameless girl who had robbed her of her husband's love such an unsavory scandal as would blight her reputation for ever.

Yet she was a miserable woman.

She plainly told her faithless husband of her resolve to commit suicide, but he only laughed in her face. As she left the house on her errand of death the brute flung a heartless jest after her. He could not believe it possible a woman would sacrifice a career like hers, merely for the love of a man.

Perhaps it was strange that such a thing should be done for such a man as he.

When, a few minutes later, however, he found his revolver was missing from his bureau drawer, he gave a long whistle, then hurried out to the nearest district messenger office.

Meantime the wife went to the home of her rival and a strange scene was enacted between those two women—one pleaded, the other sneered. Heartbreaking pathos was met by senseless simpering and giggles. The heart of a noble woman bled, while the eyes of a baby-faced doll danced with delight and exaltation that a star whom everybody envied should be pleading at her feet for the love of a man. One man! As if the world was not full of them!

What did she care for the wretched woman's insignificant husband, except that, as stage manager, he could advance her, as he had done, step by step, since he first discovered her pretty face in the back row of the chorus!

One pleaded, the other sneered.

But when the prima donna drew a pistol from her pocket and coolly told the chorus girl her intention, the brainless beauty promptly fainted away.

It would have been easy for the wronged woman to have avenged herself then, but, while she did not fear to die, she would not, could not, have the stain of another's blood upon her soul.

She was about to press the revolver to her own heart when a messenger boy was ushered in, and on the note in his hand, addressed to her rival, she recognized her husband's handwriting.

Hastily she tore the message open and read:

"Good luck at last, dear. Chance of your lifetime. Remember, my pet, it was I who made you my wife's understudy. I may do more, much more for my precious popsy-wopsy very soon.

"Study the prima-donna part for all you are worth. I may have to let you play it to-night and I want my sweetheart to score a big success.

"I have called a rehearsal for 3 this afternoon. Come perfect in music and words. You are perfect, darling, in all else.

"Lumps of love and lots of kisses to my little sugar plum, from her devoted. John Morton."

The "little sugar plum" never got those kisses. "Popsy-wopsy" never read her stage manager's disgusting message. The understudy never got her chance. She did not even attend the rehearsal call specially on her account. When she recovered consciousness she found her unwelcome visitor gone. She felt so upset that she sent an excuse to the theater, and did not even sing in the chorus that night.

Meantime when John Morton reached the theater for the 3 o'clock rehearsal he found his wife there ready to take her part. She sang and acted with more brilliancy and abandon than ever.

The stage manager's note to his wife's understudy had averted a tragedy which would have shocked half the world.

The unhappy heroine of this true story is still a prima donna. She is the pet of the public, courted, flattered and feted as few stars of the theatrical firmament ever have been.

But she is a truly miserable woman.

CRAZE FOR THINGS ANCIENT.

Druggist Had Neat Scheme for Disposing of Shopworn Goods.

"If you ever get a Jonah on your hands in the shape of eatables or drinkables, just tag it 'old-fashioned make' and it will sell before you have time to think about it," said a Columbus avenue druggist. "I found that out by experimenting with some cough drops that I couldn't get rid of. They had been lying around until they had become so stale and sticky that there seemed nothing could be done with them except to throw them away. I didn't want to do that, so as a last resort I tried the old-fashioned dodge. I piled the cough drops into a fancy jar and labeled them, 'Recipe of 1850. Cured your grandmother's cold,' and in less than half an hour the bowl had been cleaned out. Yesterday I worked the same scheme with a lot of moth balls I had left over. There is but little call for moth balls this late in the season, but by simply marking that box 'old-fashioned moth preventive' I drew in customers until they lined up three deep trying to get at them.

"This predilection for things that antedate your great-grandmother's time seems to be a reaction from excessive modernity. It is a spirit that ought to be encouraged by all tradesmen, for when sensible people will make a grand rush for prehistoric moth balls there is no limit to the candy, perfumes and drugs that they can likewise be inveigled into buying."—New York Press.

The Girl That Got Away.

"I've been married for more than twenty years," Jefferson De Angelis is reported as having said recently, "and to one wife. That's quite a record for this profession."

"I had a near engagement once," he observed. "It was long before I met the present Mrs. De Angelis. The girl was charming and I probably should have hunted up a parson with her had I not lost her through my own carelessness.

"There was plenty of work to be done those days, and frequently I let weeks go by without so much as seeing my fiancee. Once a whole month passed in this way. At the end of that time my conscience smote me and I called at the house. The girl was goodness itself and my conscience smote again. Accordingly, I went out and ordered sent to her a set of Dickens which I had wanted myself for a year and which I could very illy afford. I paid $2 down on the volumes and agreed to pay twenty-five cents a week all the rest of my life.

"Two days later I saw in a newspaper that my intended had married another man.

"Years afterward, when she had little children at her knee, I was still paying for those books.

"Ah, the fickleness of woman!"

Prince Yoe and Women.

Prince Yoe, of Korea, was talking at Atlantic City about the outrageous bathing dresses that young women wear at Ostend and Trouville.

"But a mother, a young mother," said Prince Yoe, "would never wear a bathing dress of that kind out of respect for her children. As I look at the modest costumes of the women bathers here I would think they were all mothers were not some of them too young."

The Prince smiled. Then he resumed:

"It is a fact that little children have an unusual influence on young mothers. I heard the other day of a mother who came downstairs in a very decollete gown and then went upstairs and took it off again. Why? Because her little son when he saw her in it said, ashamed: 'Oh, I'm going to write and tell papa.'"

Turtle Weighs 700 Pounds.

A monster sea turtle, known as a leather-back, has been captured at the mouth of the Nanticoke river, in Maryland. The turtle weighed between 600 and 700 pounds, was a fraction over six feet long from tip to tip of shell and had flippers over three feet from tip to tip.

A half inch hawser was required to halter the big fellow to a post. During an effort to free itself the rope, which was fastened over the head and under the flippers, became so tight that it was found that the turtle would be choked. The big reptile became entangled in an ordinary fish net spread off the mouth of the Nanticoke and practically wrecked it.

Murphy's Rise to Greatness.

Charles F. Murphy, head of Tammany hall, is now as great a nabob as his predecessor, Richard Croker. He moved to his new country place on Long Island a few days ago, carrying with him all the accessories of social greatness—a string of horses, two automobiles, a yacht, a troop of servants and many other things regarding which he did not even dream twenty years ago when he was conductor on a horse car. Said one who has known him for many years: "He does not need a knife when he eats his pie nowadays and it is said that he can make a salad dressing all by himself. Croker never made such progress in the time."

Strict Rule.

"The manager of this theater is sure nutty."

"What's the trouble?"

"Did you see the new sign he put up in the lobby?"

"No—What does it say?"

"Babies in arms positively not admitted unless accompanied by some older person."

Unmated.

"She's so pretty I don't see why it is she wasn't married long ago."

"Perhaps she's posing as a 'matchless beauty.'"

READY FOR THE THIEF.

Famous Sprinter Happened to Be In Condition for Chase.

Arthur Duffy the sprinter, who carried off many racing honors here and abroad, once told a friend of an amusing experience in New Haven, where he had gone to participate in intercollegiate athletic events.

The evening following the close of the meet Duffy was in a hotel demonstrating to his friends the best kind of clothes to don for a race. To do this better, he had stripped and put on his new trunks and running shoes. Just as he had done so, a commotion was heard in the corridor outside Duffy's door, and there were cries of "Thief! Stop thief!" It should be added that this occurred at about one in the morning, for Duffy and his friends had been to a theater and had supped afterward.

As soon as he heard the words, Duffy threw open his door and dashed out, in time to see a man darting down the stairway. He made after the man and after a sprint of half a block overtook him. As Duffy grabbed the culprit by the collar the latter wheeled as if to fight, but when he observed the trunks and the running shoes his jaw dropped and he shook his head.

"I give up, old man," said he disconsolately. "When dese hotel people gets to keeping a man ready in runnin' costume to chase a man at one in the mornin', they're too much for me!"—The Sunday Magazine.

The Mill and the Water.

"The mill will never grind
With the water that is past," "
Sighed the Moralizing Person
To the Cobbler at his last:
And he sighed again profoundly
At this solemn thought of his Concerning men's and women's Wasted opportunities.

But the Cobbler kept on cobbling.
And he said: "Well, I don't claim
To be much uv a grinder.
But I git there just the same
With cobblin' shoes; and, mister,
If I kin say my say,
I'll say that there warter
Wa'n't quite all throwed away."

The Moralizing Person
Sighed again and shook his head,
And the Cobbler kept on talking:
"Why, it's plain as day," he said,
"You kin put yer plant uv bilers
Jist below the mill an' git
A j'int er two uv pipin'
To reach right up to it;

"Then chuck in slabs and shavin's,
And set the pile afire,
An' 'fore you know it, mister,
You've got that steam up higher
Than Parson Trimble's steeple;
Then turn yer throttle, and
That mill will git a move on
And grind to beat the band."
The Cobbler ceased conversing
And let his hammer drop,
And the Moralizing Person
Got up and left the shop.

Absurd and Perilous.

Congressman Landis desired to illustrate the absurd and perilous position of a boodle politician whose dishonesty had been exposed.

"There, before the crash came," he said, "the man stood tottering and swaying, pale and scared; and, though I pitied him, I had to laugh at him because his position was so ludicrous.

"He reminded me of the Indianapolis barber who got drunk one busy Saturday afternoon.

"This barber, heavy with eighteen large, cold glasses of beer, lurched into his shop at the end of the ball game, put on his white coat, seized a razor, and began to shave a patron whom the apprentice had just lathered up.

"As the barber shaved away he held onto the patron's nose.

"'Hang it!' the patron said. 'What are you about, anyway? Let go of my nose, will you?'

"'Let go?' said the barber. 'Not a bit of it. If I did I'd fall down.'"

Pad for Fountain Pen.

A business woman who finds it necessary to carry a fountain pen wraps it in a piece of chamois and thereby saves her handkerchiefs and other feminine effects from many an ink stain. However, the chamois soon becomes saturated with ink, stiff and unpleasant and must be renewed often.

A better case can be made of inch wide ribbon lined with stockinette rubber cloth and packed with a bit of absorbent cotton at the leaky end of the pen. This will keep the pen always dry to the fingers, as the cotton can be changed without trouble and the case itself need never be soiled.

If you have a male friend who is addicted to the fountain pen habit, you can endear yourself to him by presenting him with such a case, and thus saving his short ribs from many an inky bath whenever he happens to put the pen upside down in his waistcoat pocket.

The Two Artists.

Robert Henri, the well-known painter of New York, met the other day an old friend from Boston.

The Bostonian has painted all his life, but his work is not good. Before work that is not good Mr. Henri is unable to dissemble. He cannot, to save his life, call bad art good art.

Accordingly, when the obscure painter showed the noted one a few specimens of his work no praise was bestowed on it by Mr. Henri. He only looked at it, nodded gravely and spoke of other things.

"Henri," said the Bostonian, helplessly, "I don't think I paint as well as I did ten years ago."

"Oh, yes, you do," said Mr. Henri, in a kindly voice, "only your taste has improved."

Diplomacy.

Brown—Hallo! Your typewriter's left you, I see.

Black—O, yes. I gave her notice to leave. She wasn't a bit of good—couldn't spell at all.

Brown—Was she riled when you told her she'd have to go?

Black—Not a bit. I told her she was so pretty that the clerk's couldn't get on with their work for admiring her.—Stray Stories.

With Men of Prominence

In Laurence Hutton's "Talks in a Library" he tells of a dinner he gave to Sir Henry Irving: "An unexpected guest at that dinner was Mr. Clemens. He would certainly have been invited had his presence in the city been known. He had arrived from Hartford late in the afternoon, had discovered from the gossip at the club that the Huttons were having 'a rather unusual dinner party,' was told, who were to be present, and decided that it was too good a thing to lose. So he dressed hurriedly, walked in without ceremony just as the feast began, drew up a chair by the side of his hostess, helped himself to her oysters and for the rest of the evening was the life of the party, one enthusiastic admirer of his confessing, over the coffee and cigars, that he would give half he possessed if he were intimate enough with Mark Twain to have him drop in at his house in the same delightfully original and Mark Twainy manner."

Hutton and Edwin Booth were the closest of friends. Hutton possessed one of the best collections in existence of death masks, and it was while Booth was examining this that a most impressive incident occurred. Says Hutton: "I shall never forget the first time he saw the Lincoln mask. He asked, innocently enough, whose it was. And when I told him, my heart for a moment ceasing to beat, he rose from his seat, took it in [illegible] looked at it for a lot. [illegible] word. What it meant to him we [illegible] imagine. The whole awful, awful [illegible] iness came back to him. The [illegible] dead brother; the martyred murdered president. Still, without a word, he put it back in its place and it seemed to me as he did so that he kissed it with his fingers. I have seen him in that room look at it silently over his pipe many and many a time. But he never touched it or spoke of it again, even to me. What he thought of it heaven only knows."

Hutton tells as follows of meeting Rudyard Kipling at a [illegible] given to the latter by Richard Watson Gilder: "Another engagement made me late, and I entered the room as the party was breaking up. I was introduced to Mr. Kipling with whom I exchanged the traditional few formal words, and we drifted apart, but a moment or two afterward he placed himself on the arm of a chair in which I was sitting and said: 'I didn't realize, Hutton, when I met you a moment ago who you were. Dear old Wolcott Balestier, your friend and mine, [illegible] so hard and so many times to bring us together in London and elsewhere, and now he is gone, and I can't understand it all. He died so suddenly and so far away; we had so much to say to each other, and now I have got to wait so long before I can say it.'"

Immortal John Paul Jones

As thistledown, light and impotent,
Compared with our navy now,
The wind tossed Ranger, with John Paul Jones,
The soul of her, helm to bow.

Drifting o'er ocean's meadows green,
Skimming its hills so high—
"But we will blossom," swore Jones, I ween,
"Into thistles, by and by!"

(Pause and ponder—'twas John Paul Jones Planted the seed that grew)
Into the very knives that mowed
His downlike canvas flew.

See at Whitehaven the flames leap red;
At Belfast Lough the Drake's men dead;
The Bon Homme Richard off Flamborough Head.
"Have you struck?" they cry from the Serapis.
From a sinking vessel made to foe
Was ever a braver retort than this:
"Surrendered" Jones thundered. "Surrendered? No!
I am just beginning to fight!"
Brave deeds were done that night!

But seed of sea or earth
To bloom and grow
Must be laid low
To rise to greater worth.
The Ranger's guns long ceased to roar,
The Bon Homme Richard fights no more.
The brain
That ruled the main
Became dust again
In an unmarked grave
Beyond the wave;
But his soul, that never Feared to do or dare,
It slept not there.
But rose in our navy everywhere.
His prophecy
Fulfilled we see.

Behold our virile ships,
Armored, bristling bright
As a field of thisthes from thistledown Grown terrible in might!

And to-day,
From far away
Out of the past,
With home bound pennant from the mast
Flung to the gales,
The hero sails.

Mid the flame leap and the smoke cloud rolled
From saluting cannon manifold
Ancient vessels we behold,
From England's coasts
They sail as ghosts,
From France's shore
They glide once more—
Friend and foe
Of the long ago—
In honor of John Paul Jones
Appearing on the sea.
He sails thus, after many a year,
To prove his prophecy.

Lamentable Want of Tact

Mrs. Calliper looked aggrieved as she seated herself opposite her husband at the dinner table, and knowing what was expected of him, he inquired if she had enjoyed the afternoon.

"No, I can't say I have," Mrs. Calliper admitted in a weary tone, "and all for the want of a little tact. Now, I'll tell you what happened. The dressmaker wasn't ready for me when I got there, wouldn't be for nearly an hour, so I happened to remember that Mrs. James, on whom I've never called, though she's often asked me in times past, lived two blocks away. I said I'd go there and return.

"Well, it was a little early for a call perhaps, only about half past 1, but I explained the whole thing to her. I said, 'Here I was, Mrs. James, with an hour on my hands and so near you, and how much better than to make an extra trip for the call.'

"Well, of course, any one with a particle of tact would have pretended to be glad to see me whether it was perfectly convenient or not, but do you know, she just said, 'I'm sorry, Mrs. Calliper, but it is just the hour of the children's luncheon, and I shall have to ask you to excuse me, though I'd be very glad to have you rest here.'

"As if I needed any rest! I rose immediately, of course, and started away, but I did say with a great deal of dignity that I couldn't tell when I should be able to come again. I gave her another chance, but all she said was that she was 'sorry it happened so.'

"All the way home I've been thinking how few people there are who have had the benefit of such home training as I had as a girl, and I've been trying to make allowance for that woman; but when I think of the hour I spent in the dressmaker's stuffy waiting room it certainly is hard work."—Youth's Companion.

Visiting Grave of "Elia"

Hutton's "Literary Landmarks of London" was largely a labor of love, and was the result of years of hard work. Mr. Hutton gives this example of the difficulties that stood in his way: "Another Sunday afternoon I devoted to pious pilgrimage to the grave of Charles Lamb at Edmonton. As usual, nobody at Edmonton knew anything. The churchyard is not a small one, and it is entirely filled. The sexton and the grave digger and a few persons wandering about could give me no information. Most of them had never heard of Mr. Lamb; and I could not find the sacred spot. Naturally I applied to the rector; and, as he left the vestry door after service, leaning on the arm of a pretty young woman, I approached him, raised my hat and asked, politely, if he could tell me where Charles and Mary Lamb were resting. Really, he could not say! And I, forgetting the day, the place and his sacred office, cursed that rector for his criminal ignorance.

"'Great heavens!' I said. 'You ought to be ashamed of yourself. In your care have been placed the ashes of one of the foremost men in the whole history of English letters. And you don't know where they are! They have made your churchyard and your parish distinguished all the world over, I have come 3,000 miles to visit Charles Lamb's grave, and you, the rector of the church, don't know where it is!' 'You ought to be heartily ashamed of yourself.' And I turned upon my heel and left him standing there, speechless and confounded."

Half an hour after the above incident occurred, and while Hutton was groping around the graveyard in the twilight, the rector came to him, hat in hand, apologized most humbly for his ignorance (which he had corrected in the meantime) and conducted him to the grave of the immortal Elia.

Were Stealing Second Base

The late Samuel Colcord Bartlett, when president of Dartmouth college, was not exactly enthusiastic over athletics, but was, nevertheless, often pretty well informed when the students thought him indifferent.

At the time when the following incident is said to have occurred, the baseball team was composed of hard hitting but rather slow and clumsy players, who had lost several close games at home by slow and stupid base running.

One night, the president, nervous and tired, finding himself unable to sleep, quietly drew on his clothes and started for a short walk across the campus, in the hope of quieting his nerves. Now it happened that about the same time a couple of students who had been assisting a classmate in celebrating his birthday started to return to their rooms.

The old campus was used as a ball ground, and the sight of the white bases, gleaming white in the moonlight, suggested to one of the hilarious youths the brilliant idea of "stealing" second base and carrying it home. They succeeded in detaching it, and were pursuing a triumphant though tortuous course across the campus when who should appear but "Old Prex." There was no escape. The old gentleman sternly accosted them and demanded what they were doing.

"W—w—well, sir, to t—tell the truth," stammered they, "we were stealing second base."

President Bartlett bowed with courtly grace, gave a preliminary barking cough and exclaimed:

"Ah, gentlemen, pardon me, I—br— didn't know there was anybody in college who could steal second base. Br—br— Good-night, gentlemen."

Sheep Raising in the South.

I have wondered why James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, has never given the powerful impetus to sheep raising in the South and its almost incomputable possibilities. Certainly her [illegible] of "least resistance" to develop this business, which, in turn, would give an impetus to cognate or allied industries that would put the South on a plane of development almost as great as was given by cotton manufacture. He could be developed the business of raising lambs for the city markets of North and West, an [illegible] in its search to clear [illegible] fruits and vegetables. But there is another aspect to the matter that makes sheep raising in the South a pressing necessity. Any one familiar with the inroads the sawmills are making on our yellow pine areas of the South and the effects on the topography this deforestation must view almost with dismay the future condition. Our heavy precipitation, in conjunction with the rough and hilly topography, sets the soil washing rapidly. The soil being shallow more or less is soon gullied, and the sand is washed into the valleys. The landscape is scarred, [illegible] marred in unsightliness, and, [illegible] by instances the ruin is irredeemable. This is proceeding at a fearful rate, and on a large and concerted action is necessary.

The railroads, if they could only be induced to reflect upon it, are most interested, for who will want to go on these cutover, unsightly areas when the timber has been removed? At present they are having a fine business in the tonnage of the lumber the great pine areas afford them from the innumerable mills along their lines, but after the timber is exhausted what then? It is no answer to say truckers and fruit raisers will occupy them. They will do so, and have done so, in a measure, but they can only sparsely populate the vast areas now spoiled by the sawmills. And, truly, these very sandy lands, with a rolling topography, ought never to be bared. They ought to be put down in Bermuda grass, red top or herd's grass and clover. These would furnish pasturage for sheep the year round.

Every considerable railroad in the South might do an infinite service by having several experimental farms along their lines, where the finest wool sheep could be thus raised. The industry would soon be largely imitated. It is a needed diversification in Southern agriculture. Ere long wool-using manufacturers would come in and populous town would soon spring up, or else some may be some way irreclaimable wastes.

SOUTHERN FARM NOTES.

TOPICS OF INTEREST TO THE PLANTER, STOCKMAN AND TRUCK GROWER.

Sheep Raising in the South.

I have wondered why James Wilson, secretary of Agriculture, has never given the powerful impulse of his patronage to sheep raising in the South and its almost incomputable possibilities. Certainly here is the line of "least resistance" to develop the business which, in turn, would give an impetus to cognate or allied industries that would put the South on a plane of development almost as great as was given by cotton manufacture. Here could be developed the business of growing lambs for the early markets. The West, an industry kindred in part to that of raising early vegetables. Here could be developed that would furnish Eastern farmers.

The South could be the greatest centre for manufacturing fine woolen fabrics in the world, for, with the cheapness of labor, the cheapness of sheep, the fineness of pasturage given the same breed, no section in the manufacturers could get wool at so low a price. The woolen manufacturers would have to come from New England and Europe to weave this wool, as cotton mills have done in the case of cotton. I have long regarded wool raising and the manufacture of woolen goods in the South as among its great but unexploited resources and potentialities.

But there is another aspect to this matter that makes sheep raising in the South a pressing necessity. Any one familiar with the inroads the sawmills are making on our yellow pine areas of the South and the effects on the topography this deforestation makes, must view almost with dismay their future condition. Our heavy precipitations in conjunction with the rolling and hilly topography, sets the soil to washing rapidly. The soil being sandy more or less is soon gullied, and the land is washed into the valleys. The landscape is scarred and marred into unsightliness, and, in many instances, the ruin is irredeemable. This is proceeding at a fearful rate, and some large and concerted action is necessary.

The railroads, if they could only be induced to reflect upon it, are most interested, for who will want to settle on these cutover, unsightly areas when the timber has been removed? At present they are having a fine business in the tonnage of the lumber these great pine areas afford them from the innumerable mills along their lines, but after the timber is exhausted what then? It is no answer to say that truckers and fruit raisers will occupy them. They will do so, and have done so, in a measure, but they can only sparsely populate the vast areas despoiled by the sawmills. And, truth is, these very sandy lands, with a hilly topography, ought never to be broken. They ought to be put down in Bermuda grass, red top or herd's grass and white clover. These would furnish pasture for sheep the year round.

Every considerable railroad in the South might do an infinite service by having several experimental farms on them where the finest wool breed of sheep could be thus raised. They would soon be largely imitated. This is a line of diversification in Southern agriculture. Ere long woolen manufactories would come in and prosperous towns would soon spring up, where there may be some day irreclaimable ruin.

As it is, there is room for many millions in the Gulf States to grow the wool that is raised there at great cost to the great mills of Philadelphia and Boston, many tributes to middlemen and merchants ere consumers in the wool material. Of these sheep are well known as lake sheep, have been long established and are highly esteemed and profitable.—M. B. Hillyard, in Farmer.

Sweet Potatoes.

[illegible] of Texas, gives the following method of planting of sweet potatoes:

[illegible] sweet potato question [illegible] be said on this be[illegible] there is no animal or fowl on [illegible] which relishes it, cooked [illegible] toothsome or whole[illegible] to find for man. For [illegible] its value is about three [illegible] to one of corn, but [illegible] to the yield, it is from [illegible] times that of corn per [illegible] no farmer that has a few [illegible] of sandy land has any excuse for [illegible] and a nice dish of good [illegible] three times a day [illegible] s in the year. So I will [illegible] that seems to me the best [illegible] of cultivation. I know it will [illegible] in all cases and under all circumstances, but I believe it worthy of any one's consideration.

To [illegible] sweet potato bed, dig [illegible] with three feet wide and six [illegible] deep, and as long as you need. Fill [illegible] inches with fresh stable [illegible] press down smooth, cover with loose soil two inches deep, then lay potatoes on that along side of each other, not one on top of the other. Then cover with rich soil to the depth of three inches; keep bed moist as long as needed for slips. You can use vines cut ten inches long. Be sure to bury two or three joints in setting out.

In preparing the land, be sure you have it in good tilth, for there is no crop that depends as much on well pulverized soil as the sweet potato. Make your ridges moderately high, smooth off with a light board that will cover three rows at a time. Now you are ready to set your slips any time you have moisture enough to make them live.

In regard to cultivation, as soon as the plants take hold of the ground and show that they are going to live, it is time to commence cultivation, for you will find a first class stand of weeds and grass if you have any seed. Take off the outside feet of your cultivator and put on two twelve or fourteen inch sweeps on the inside feet. (Must have beams of inside feet hung on springs so as to give them a movement in any direction.) You must necessarily go slow, but you will find with a little practice you can clean your drill. Then with a thirty-inch solid sweep once in the middle you will have your potatoes clean. Do this as often as the grass comes up until the vines get too long. Remove all grass or weeds that might be left by the plow with hand or hoe.

Radishes and Peppers Profitable.

A Louisianian has the following to say of what he did with early crops of radishes and peppers:

In January last I planted Chinese giant sweet pepper seed in hotbed; as pepper plants grow very slowly at first and as it is not advisable to set them out before all danger of frost has passed, I planted them with turnip radish seed the last of January. These did very well and most of the crop was shipped to Kansas City in sugar barrels with about fifty pounds ice in each barrel. The first shipment was made March 9 and the last April 8. They netted $86.88.

Immediately upon clearing the ground of the radish crop I set out 400 pepper plant, quite large by this time. The plants were set two and a half feet asunder in rows three feet apart, and occupied about half of the radish ground. A stake was driven at each plant at once and the plants tied securely. After the plants had started growing I applied a small quantity of commercial fertilizer to each.

The month of May was very dry and I was compelled to water the plants separately with hose attached to a force pump. Later, when rains came, growth was fine. At first a Planet Jr. single wheel hoe was used, but when the plants became too large for this I used an ordinary garden hoe. As the plants grew it was necessary to continue tying them up, as they are very tender and easily broken by the wind.

About the time the plants began to fruit I applied a small shovelful of well rotted manure to each. As the season advanced, the price of peppers declined, until I received only six cents a dozen. My last sale, which was made November 21, brought total receipts up to $43.50.

The ground is cleared again and sowed with mustard, which was off in time to follow the last of January, 1905, with radishes again.

Destroying Wild Onions.

A correspondent asks for a way of destroying wild onions. A heavy application of salt to the ground occupied by the onions, or water at the boiling point will kill them. It might be difficult to make this application on any large scale, however.

We believe that the best way of dealing with the problem is by putting the ground so troubled in some crop calling for clean culture. No plant is known to us that can live through this sort of treatment, and probably, all things considered, it is the most economical way of removing the difficulty. By it all undesirable vegetable growths can be brought to an end. Some plants are almost certain to be missed by any of the other methods employed with this object in view.—Home and Farm.

Killing Borers.

The various borers that infest fruit trees nearly always enter the tree bodies right at the surface of the ground, where the bark is soft, and work upwards inside the wood. A wire inserted in the hole made by them will usually destroy them and prevent further injury, and the work should be attended to in good season.

Trees Need Room.

Give trees plenty of room if you would have them thrifty and vigorous and bear large well matured fruit. It is better to err on the side of giving more room than is necessary, rather than on the other.—Southern Fruit Grower.

SATIN COMING IN.

In selecting a ball gown the main desire is to have it as effective as possible while keeping it at the same time becoming and fashioned after the latest modes. Especially for the debutante and younger members of society is a gown of tulle, chiffon, and silk mousseline, attractive, but the great drawback is its extreme perishableness. It is well-nigh impossible to make a net gown last through one season even, so that if there cannot be many "best" gowns provided in the outfit it were well to have these few of some lasting and serviceable material, says the Washington Times.

Already advance winter textures are for sale, but also there are some few of last year's materials still left to be disposed of, and it is among the silks and satins, which, while not of latest fashion, perhaps are still almost equally attractive, that the real bargains are to be found. Even if the gown is not to be made up immediately it is well worth while, if one can find just the piece of silk or satin desired, to invest at once, that it may be on hand and made up early in the autumn or winter.

Satin is to be immensely fashionable this season of 1905-1906, and in all shades from the palest to the most brilliant will be worn for dinner, opera and balls. If made of a heavy quality the gown is generally more or less simple, but the thinner varieties, in so far as they are all softer and more pliable, need a certain amount of trimming and elaboration to be sufficiently effective. Among the new satins or silks is the so-called "radium," an exquisitely pretty material, soft and shimmering which is already very fashionable and is destined to meet with still wider popularity as time goes on. A white or black satin gown if the material is of the best and the cut and fit perfect, may be absolutely plain, save for some little lace or maline about the decollettage and still be wonderfully effective. There need be no girdle to this gown, although waist and skirt are separate, the bodice being fastened in back beneath a band shirring.

Satin and dull finish crepe de chine are both more than ever popular and many of the handsome and most expensive models in evening gowns for this season and the next are of richly embroidered crepe. The dresses in embroidered crepe are not at all difficult to make up, and in many cases make most effective gowns at comparatively little cost.

Brocade in both large and small flower designs is destined to be even more fashionable than last winter, when the material had not been seen to any extent for some little time. Brocade must not be too much cut up with bands of lace and embroidery, as unless the pattern is very vague and indefinite, all trimming tends to shorten the figure unbecomingly.

Flowered silks and taffetas of solid shade always wear well and are bound to be attractive if a becoming shade is chosen. Color contrasts are worked in with the flowered silks even more than with the solid shades.

THE KAREN WOMEN.

Like the Siamese, says Outing, the Karen women are not good to look upon and do not improve their appearance any by style of ornaments they affect. When very young their ears are pierced to admit a small round stick, which is gradually increased in diameter until by the time the little girls have become women their ears easily accommodate a two-inch disc of blackened bamboo. This stretches the ears hideously, as may be imagined; and when the ornament is laid aside temporarily!—well—picture the thin strips of pendent ear lobe! As a rule the Karen women wear their hair long, but, like the Siamese, some cut it short, and others again keep it cropped close, except on top of the head, where it is allowed to grow to its natural length—which does not add to their by no means overabundance of good looks. Sometimes the unmarried woman wears a breast cloth, but for the most part men and women wear a long girdle, and sometimes even that is set aside in hot weather.

To thoroughly appreciate Japanese women one should begin the far eastern trip at the Malay peninsula, journeying thence through Siam, Anum, Cambodia and China—though confess to preferring a good looking Chinese girl to the alleged Japanese beauty.

Bracelets and necklaces of bamboo are the other usual ornaments, except when they can afford a narrow neckband of silver which protects, so it is believed, against many evils that lurk along life's wayside even in the jungle. The men also wear this neckband and bamboo an inch in diameter and about four inches long stuck through their ear lobes. Some of the boys are rather good looking. They wear their hair in a knot like a horn on the forehead, or at one side or the other of the head, or on top; and usually a turban crowns the topknot. All in all, the Karens differ not a great deal from the Siamese in physiognomy, but the people in this section of the far east shade into one another rather easily.

DO NOT BE A GIRL LOAFER.

A girl loafer. That does not sound very pretty, does it? And yet there are a good many girls whom the title fits. In other words, there are girls who spend their time doing absolutely nothing. Circumstances do not render it necessary for them to earn their living, and so they stay at home and fritter the precious moments away in useless pursuits or idleness. Don't a good many of them lie in bed in the morning and let their mothers get up and get breakfast? And don't you think they also dress up in their best clothes and spend the afternoons enjoying themselves, while their mothers stay home and prepare the evening meal? And when they are home they spend their time reading trashy novels or trimming equally trashy hats.

When a girl goes to a party and is late in getting to bed she looks on it as quite proper and natural that she should lie in bed late the next morning, and all of the family accepts the fact as a matter of course. But, if the mother is up half the night with an ailing baby, neither her lazy daughter nor any other member of the family seems to think it necessary that she should stay in bed and make up her broken sleep. Perhaps if some of these girls could appreciate the enormous value of time they would not waste it. Our lives are such tiny drops in the ocean of time, and we can never, never call back one precious lost minute.

Dear girls, don't allow yourselves to be called by that ugly word "loafer," and yet you will be if you deserve it. If your brother lie around the house all day, half dressed and doing nothing, they would be called "loafers," so why not you as well as they? "Loafing" is a habit that grows on one with a fatal rapidity, and unless you want to be held irrevocably in its clutches you must break away from it at once.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

WORRY AND BEAUTY.

There is a saying that "Every time a sheep bleats it loses a mouthful of hay." Every time a woman worries she loses a little of her attractiveness and takes marks of age.

If your servant scorches the soup or overcooks the meat, never mind. You cannot afford to worry about it, and if you scold her you make up your mind to lose some of your beauty, to let go some of your magnetism.

If the members of the family are habitually late try to remedy it, but don't worry about it. If you do you will grow older in the process.

If your husband or children do things which do not please you do not nag at them. This will only aggravate the evil you complain of and it will cost you some of their love and respect. Every time you nag you will lose a little of your power to charm and attract them to you.

If the cleaners spoil your favorite dress don't get angry about it. An outbreak of hot temper will take away much more of your attractiveness than your dress could supply.

If you lose your pocketbook don't worry about it. Worrying will not bring it back, but it will take out of your face and disposition that which money can never replace.

If you meet with bitter disappointment don't fret, don't cry over it. If you do you pay a penalty which you can ill afford. No woman can fret and nag and worry and keep away the marks of age or retain her beauty and power to please.—Success.

TO PLUMP OUT THIN FACE.

The pretty and fashionable girl must no longer have a long oval face. It is decreed that the plump-faced damsel is quite smart, and large cheeks, red as roses, are just what every girl is aiming to possess. Beauty doctors are devising means to plump out thin faces. Not so very long ago oval faces were considered one of the greatest beauty points, and it was little less than a crime to have a round, plump, healthy-looking face, but today this has changed somewhat.

All sorts of oils are good for making the face fat, but they very often work too readily, and if the process is kept up bad results are often the outcome. It requires constant care to plump out a thin face, and the first step to be taken is the teeth. No face will become fleshy if any teeth are missing, and a trip to the dentist will work wonders. There are some very good skin foods which bring good results, and if a certain course is pursued it would be no time before a change is noticed. If the face is heated by hot applications for five or ten minutes and a skin food massaged into the pores the efforts will be duly shown in a short time. Rubbing the fact at night with cold cream will plump it out, also—Newark Advertiser.

THE PULPIT.

A BRILLIANT SUNDAY SERMON BY DR. CHARLES EDWARD LOCKE.

Subject: Music and Culture.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Dr. Charles Edward Locke, pastor of the Hanson Place M. E. Church, preached Sunday on "Music as a Factor in Culture." He took his text from Psalms cl:1: "Praise ye the Lord." Dr. Locke said:

From that moment in the creation when the morning stars sang together and the brooks went singing down the hillsides of Eden, and the birds made glad the dawn of time with their thrilling melodies, music has had an indisputable place in the world.

The study of music is a liberal education. Music, like poetry, makes its appeal to the noblest instincts of the soul. It is said that the inhabitants of Cynette, who slighted music, were the cruellest of all the Greeks and no other town was so immersed in luxuries and debauchery.

Christianity was born with a song on its lips. Mary sang in thrilling measures of the Magnificat; the angels sang in their tumultuous hallelujah chorus; and the shepherds sang in plaintive strains of quiet ecstasy. And the world has been singing ever since. Paganism does not sing; it laments. Pagodas and mosques do not lighten their sombre interiors with music, but every Christian church, however humble, is a conservatory of sweetest melodies.

Music is both a science and an art. As an art it does not, as do painting and sculpture, occupy itself in reproducing nature—for it is itself a part of nature, and seeks to reveal itself. The Egyptians first excelled in music, but great strides were made by the Greeks under Pythagoras. The word music is derived from a Greek term, which includes all the learing of the Muses. Of all the fine arts, music is the most comprehensive. The majesty of the architect, the pictures of the artist, the rhythm of the poet and the themes of all these belong to the musician, whether he sits at the instrument or pours out his soul in vocal melodies. The fable tells that Mercury stretched strings of dried skin across a shell, and, striking them with his fingers, invented the lyre. The bow as a musical instrument was probably first used by the warrior, who, as he described his successes in battle, twanged the string of his bow. It was later discovered that the bow, when drawn across certain hollow objects, produced pleasing sounds—thence the lute and the violin. Music has been called the universal language, and truly it is a means of communication between all souls, whatever clime may have given them birth. It is the most responsive of all the arts—the most human. It more nearly breathes and sees and feels. It possesses all the varying hues of the soul. The music of the siren would allure Ulysses to his death and the monotonous tones of the bell buoy direct the imperiled mariner to safety. Tumultuous music is the completest expression of happy souls on festal days; and tender, sombre strains interpret the language of sad hearts when a nation mourns for its martyred heroes. Glad hallelujah, or penitential psalm, expresses the contrasting emotions of the soul.

Music was defined by our own Sidney Lanier as "love in search of a word." There is an inexpressible something in the heart of man which seeks to define itself in speech, but, failing in this, music flies to his relief and in melody he pours out his imprisoned soul. Music is the language of the over-soul; it is the soul prolonging, or projecting itself. The highest music cannot be expressed in words. This is the explanation of the angel's advent anthem and of all music in worship. The deeper the soul life the more is one conscious of feelings beyond the limitations of articulate utterance. In the attempt of the finite soul to praise and glory the Infinite, all earthly devices of language utterly fail, and music only, which is an adjunct of the infinities, enables man to sing what he can never express, his adoration and gratitude to his great God and King. Consequently, whenever religion is the sincerest, then music will be the purest. Music is the echo of God's voice in the soul of man. Without that echo man's soul is a cavernous abyss, filled with specters of despair.

Music is a gift of God. Like all the sciences, it is a radiation of divine truth. Pythagoras taught a close affinity between music and astronomy. He was right so far as he went, but music leads men up to the perpetual throne of glory, of which stars and constellations are but glittering scintillations. St. Cecelia, receiving her music from angel visitants, tells the secret of the musician's power. Great musicians are born, not made. Their extraordinary genius is an endowment manifesting itself in phenomenal ways in childhood, as in the cases of Mozart, Liszt and Christine Nilsson.

The divinity of music further appears in the fact that the greatest musicians have been good men; and to develop the mighty impulses which they have felt in their souls the great musicians have chosen lofty divine themes. This was true of Jubal and Job, of David with his harp, and Solomon with his sweet songs. It was true of Beethoven, whose soulful sonatas have won for him a genuine priesthood of the emotions; and of Bach, whose elaborate fugues have been likened to Gothic temples in their intricate details. It was true of Mendelssohn, who, in thirty-eight years, filled the souls of men with musical pictures; and of Batiste and Schumann; and of Chopin in his nocturnes; and of wierd if not unearthly Paganini, with his miraculous Stradivarius. It was true of Mozart, whose thirty-five years gave the world such treasures from the Infinite that he is truly exhaustless; and of Liszt, who dying as late as 1886, seems to belong to us. At eight he was the wonder of Europe; at twelve Beethoven embraced him as a coming master. During the days of his best work, Thomas a Kempis' "Imitation of Christ" was his constant companion. It was true of Wagner, picturesque, unique, once ostracised, now nearly worshiped. "The Holy Grail" is the theme of one of his masterful operas. Most true was it of Haydn, the father of symphony, whose massive oratorio of "The Creation" brings men into the presence of God's colossal creative power; and true, indeed, of Handel, the majestic grandeur of whose masterpieces has remained unequalled for two centuries. There was another incarnation when he produced his divinest work, the oratorio of "The Messiah," which no doubt he was right in believing came to him from above.

It is the mission of music to soften and remove the asperities of men. It helps to unify the race and make them homogeneous. Sectarianism slinks into hiding places of shame, as Charles Wesley, a Methodist, sings "Jesus, Lover of My Soul;" and Toplady, a Calvanist, "Rock of Ages," and Sarah Adams, a Unitarian, "Nearer My God to Thee," and Whittier, a Quaker, "The Eternal Goodness," and Faber, a Roman Catholic, "There's a Wideness in God's Mercy," and Doddridge, a Baptist, "O, Happy Day." To-day these well-known hymns are sung by all and claimed by all. In spite of controversy and unbelief, the music of the Christian Church is saving the world for the Christian Christ. The hymn and the singer are often a long way in advance of the sermon and hearer in evangelizing influences.

Music refines and ennobles. In the days of chivalry the sir knights studied music because of its elevating and purifying influence. Music brightens life's dark places and soothes the heart in trouble. Many prison doors have opened and manacles burst asunder when troubled hearts have sung songs in the night. Music was believed by the ancients to have healing power, and was used as a therapeutic. Many a weary soldier, tired and footsore, has leaped on to victory under the magic spell of life and drum.

There is a quaint belief that singing preceded speaking. Alas! perhaps one of the entailments of sin is that singing has degenerated into discordant, rasping speech. Perhaps, when man shall have reached his highest earthly estate the means of communication will be in the soft tones of chastest music.

Music, if not more, perfectly than printing, the art preservative of all art, is surely the best interpreter of of all art and science. The mystery and miracle of truth reveal their open sesame when studied through the atmosphere of music. The minster, graceful with gothic beauty, or massive with Romanesque magnificence, can only be filled to groined arches and spreading dome by music's swelling tones. Music gives a motif to architecture. The art gallery's corridors, or belvederes only reveal the master's secret in marble or canvas as divinest music fills up all the interstices of finiteness. And poetry never reveals its most exquisite tints of beauty and truth except when in the companionship of music, its twin sister. Theology would have none but altars to the unknown God if music did not dream, and prophesy, and feel, in the priestly office. Music is what Walter Pater called "the great Anders-Streben-reaching forward of all art." It is the soul of man endeavoring to come to its own—to express and realize and fulfill itself. It helps Browning's grasp to acquire its reach.

Music is thus an intellectual factor. It is not so much a truth seeker as it is a truth finder. It does not delve among the rocks, but it comes down like a dove from above, singing, "This Is My Beloved Son!" It dwells in the heights and shouts "Excelsior!" from peak to peak, and makes life's dizzy Alpine uplands echo with hope.

Granting that music furnished to culture its initial impulse, and that music more than any other factor sustains the quest of man's nature for the highest and holiest achievements, I dare to submit the deliberate conclusion that instrumental, and well as vocal, music should be a part of the public school curriculum for every child. Alas! that the children whom posterity affords the opportunity of musical study often so little appreciate these privileges, while many who crave these facilities are deprived of them by poverty. Even the boys and girls who are compelled to leave school to enter upon the problems of making a living, would live a larger and more hopeful life if their musical instruction had included familiarity with an instrument.

As is his Maker, so man is a spirit. Muscle and brain are merely temporary expedients by which man, as spirit, shall for a brief season tarry upon this earth. When painting, and sculpture, and architecture, and, perhaps, even poetry, shall have ended their earthly ministry, music will be revealing the fathomless mysteries of spirit and life. Music is the language of celestial throngs. True eloquence is thought winged with music. The Infinite God is more perfectly worshiped with musical accompaniment because music goes beyond language and logic and opens up the vistas of faith through which can be seen the King in His beauty. Do you ask me which is the mightier agency for culture, Bacon or Beethoven? Spencer or Schumann? Kant or Mendelssohn? and I will answer that science and philosophy have their own important places in the foundation of intellect and character, and are as necessary to the soul as food to the body; music, however, not only has its mission side by side with these, but when the present conclusions of men shall be abandoned for the completer revelations of the all truth of Him who is the Way, the Truth and the Life, then music, which was never anything but divine in its nature and influence, shall be our old familiar friend increasing in divinity as our own evolving souls are permitted to comprehend and participate in that divinity.

The Body's Cross.

Keep green my love, keep fresh my remembrance, keep young my heart; feed me with the feast of yesterday; stir me with the songs of yesterday; brace me with the breezes of yesterday; glad me with the glow of yesterday. Let me walk the valley by the memory of the mountain air, by the health of the spirit; let me bear the body's cross.—George Matheson.

God in Your Life.

Religion at its best is a high, but still increasing, consciousness of God's life in one's own. "I and the Father are one" is the humblest word a man can utter, when it is but another version of the prayer, "Not my will, but Thine." When that Gethsemane prayer is prayed and meant and lived, the other word, "I and the Father are but one," becomes the simple fact.

J. OSMOND MIDDLETON.

Attorney J. Osmond Middleton has severed his business relations here and left last Saturday for Birmingham, where he will reside in the future. This is news which the good citizens of Clanton will hear with deep regret. Mr. Middleton has formed a partnership for the practice of law with Mr. J. Wiley Logan, a young lawyer of promise, who has already acquired a lucrative practice in the Birmingham district. Mr. Logan is also a former Chilton county boy. The style of the firm will be Middleton & Logan, with offices in the First National Bank building. While Mr. Middleton has only been engaged in the practice of the law a couple of years, he has from the very first proved himself to be a strong lawyer, and his clients have always realized that their interests were safe in his hands; in advocacy and forensic powers he is the peer of any. In this move the bar of Clanton loses one of its strongest members, and Chilton county a staunch citizen. Mr. Middleton is a young man of strong character, broad, liberal views, brilliant and eloquent, and will undoubtedly forge to the front in his new field of labor. His hosts of friends join us in the wish that his efforts may be crowned with the success which his high attainments so richly merit. It is understood that Mr. Middleton will attend the fall term of Circuit Court here to look after the interests of his clients who have cases pending in that court.

A COUNTY PAPER.

To quote an old saw, " Acounty paper as is a county paper," is the Geneva Reaper, and its Trade and Souvenir Edition of last week was "a daisy." The merchants of Geneva appreciate the paper, as is shown by the advertisements; and likewise "prove by their works" that they want the people's trade. If merchants won't advertise in a paper, it is tantamount to them saying that they don't care about the trade of the patrons of that paper, and all the self-respecting patrons will not patronize such merchants unless forced to by circumstances.

ABOUT TAXES.

Many of our people seem to have gotten a wrong idea about the tax raising that has been going on lately. There is a certain amount of money that must be raised to pay the running expenses of the county and state. If property is undervalued the tax rate must be put higher. It is far better to have a high valuation of property and a low tax rate. It adds to the good reputation of a county or state and attracts settlers from other communities. Tax Commissioner J. P. Vanderveer, who was appointed by Gov. Jelks some months ago, has done a great deal of good work along that line. He has found thousands of acres of land in this county that were not returned for taxation, and has raised a number of the corporations which own land in Chilton, notably the Alabama Mineral Land Company, which was only paying about $1 an acre on its land, and 1 cent an acre on the mineral rights which it holds on some 30,000 acres. The land was raised to $2 and the mineral rights to 20 cents per acre. Mr. W. A. Davis, the agent of this company, says the mineral rights are valueless, so now would be a good time for the people who have bought lands in the past from this company to get the STRING cut that is on their land and so be the FULL and COMPLETE OWNERS of their farms. The company no doubt would be glad to sell these mineral rights so as to avoid paying taxes on something that is of no value. Mr. Davis may be mistaken. You see he has (by his own statement) 267,000 acres of land on his mind, but it would do no harm to ask this company what they will take for the mineral rights on your farms. Try it. Mr. vanderveer deserves ALL the credit in these tax raises, as he done the work and the commissioners were forced to take cognizance of what he put before them, or else be subject to impeachment for neglect of duty.

"Private banks, judging by recent experiences in Indiana, are excellent places to keep money out of. Numbers of them have failed disgracefully, but the worst was the one in the old Quaker county of Wayne. After the cashier had killed himself, supposedly because there was nothing more to steal, a remarkable condition of affairs developed. Not a dollar had been put in as capital stock by the alleged owners, the concern being run entirely on the deposits put in by the patrons, who were mostly made up of neighboring farmers. All of this money had disappeared, besides a lot of bonds left with the bank as special deposits. The platter had been swept clean by the pious cashier, whom everybody trusted implicitly, he being regarded as a model citizen in every respect. After a searching investigation it has been found impossible to tell where the money went, though, if the belief of the ultra orthodox churches be true, it is not difficult to tell where the dead cashier went."—The American Farmer, Indianapolis, Ind.

"Just before the Topeka bank went down ker-plunk, never to rise again, a bank examiner went through it and pronounced it sound and solvent."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

ABOUT ORCHARDS.

Dr. E. Mead Wilcox, the Plant Pathologist of the Experiment Station at Auburn, recently visited the peach orchards about Thorsby for the purpose of making an investigation of some troubles being experienced there by some of the peach growers in their orchards. It was found that many of the trees had suffered from the severe cold of the past winter which had resulted in the peculiar conditions often referred to as "winter killing." Dead areas of bark were found on these trees and in the most severe cases the bark was killed entirely around the tree, resulting in some cases in the death of the tree. It may be that in many cases the winter killing was followed by the attach of some root disease, but in general such is not the case.

The most serious enemy of many of these orchards are the owners who have failed in many cases to give the orchards the attention in the way of cultivation required to insure healthy bearing trees. Clean cultivation is absolutely required in peach and other orchards. It may be necessary in many cases to grow during the winter some leguminous crop to be plowed under to increase the nitrogen content of the soil. But in any case it is an absolute waste of time and money to attempt to grow trees on ground covered with weeds as high as the trees. Attention should also be given to the borers and for this purpose the use of some wash may be desirable. Borers already in the tree can only be destroyed by cutting out or killing with a flexible wire run into the holes.

They may be largely prevented from entering by keeping the trees covered from about six inches below the surface of the soil to a height of about 2 feet with the following mixture: Two quarts of strong soft soap and half a pint of crude carbolic acid with 2 ounces of Paris green are thoroughly mixed with water in a bucket and then made into a thin paste by the addition of enough lime and clay. It may also be well at the same time to keep the same part of the tree covered during the spring and summer months with a piece of tar paper securely fastened to the tree. This will prevent the moth from depositing its eggs upon the trunk of the tree. The wash can serve no other purpose than to prevent the larvae hatched from these eggs from gaining an entrance into the tree. It is absurd to think of furnishing the tree any food material through the bark. Clean cultivation and intelligent care of the trees along the lines mentioned should bring success to those interested in the Thorsby orchards.

A GOOD WORKER GONE.

Mrs. Silsbee Williams, aged 55 years, died Saturday and was buried in Hopewell cemetery on Sunday, Rev. Mixson, of Shelby, preaching the funeral sermon. The Home Mutual Benefit Society, of which the deceased had long been a member, attended the funeral in full regalia. This society is doing a good work among the better class of our colored citizens, inculcating the true spirit of self-help; and in time of sickness it pays a weekly stipend, and in case of death the funeral expenses. The writer wishes to say that the deceased was his laundress for a number of years and she was an industrious, hard working woman, and one who kept her word as to her work.

PLEASANT GROVE.

Editor Union:

The series of meetings which closed here on Saturday, the 2nd inst., has been of great benefit to this church. Nine members were gained, 3 by letter and six by baptism. Macedonia church is having a revival this week, Rev. G. W. Freeman, of Bibb Co., is conducting the services, and all hope this will be the best meeting ever held there. Misses Anna McCary, Lillie Franklin, Bettie Gibson and Leila Oates are very sick, but we hope for their speedy recovery. Wilson Spivey and family are visiting friends and relatives. There is about 8 miles of telephone line nearly completed in this section, running from Jemsion southwest to W. E. Thomas' place; thence down the road to B. F. Rasberry's place, in all about 8 miles. We say hurrah for these new enterprises. I enjoy reading the many communications in THE UNION, but would enjoy it better if I could read them just above the full name of the writer rather than "One of the Boys," "Dad's Plow Boy" or some other fictitious name.

Yours truly,

JAMES FRANKLIN.

Editor Union:

Health good and every one busy picking cotton. Our protracted meeting ended Friday with services and the ordinance of baptism. The meeting has been good. Brothers J. H. Thomas and Parrish have preached for us. Monroe Scott and wife are very happy over an increase in their family which was a boy and mother and child are doing well. We were certainly glad to see the article from "C. W. L." of Center Point in THE UNION. He holds my opinion exactly on organization. I belonged to the Alliance from start to finish and then I joined the Cotton Association, and now the Farmers' Educational and Co-operative Union of America, and I've joined that. If any other comes along I'll join it, and so be sure to get in the right one, although I think the last named, the Union, is the one, those before being the forerunners of the true one, as John the Baptist was of our Savior. Now, let's all stick together and make the Union a business organization strictly for our benefit in county, state and nation. All who do not yet belong, join the nearest Union to you. It won't cost you much, and then attend regular and help to roll the wheel along, and note the benefits that will flow in upon us farmers. "One of the Boys," from Randolph, I like your last piece. Come again. I love to read the letters from the different places. Let's all help the editor run OUR PAPER, and give him all the news and subscriptions that we can. Success to THE UNION and its many readers.

DAD'S PLOW BOY.

MARBURY.

Editor Union:

Several of our neighbors attended court in Verbena a short time ago. L. C. Hawes was tried for retailing liquor without a license. Mr. Hawes got several of his friends to testify that they would not believe Mr. Woodie Parrish on oath, he being the principal witness against Hawes. The reason they give for so swearing was that it was a common talk in the community that Mr. Parrish was not truthful. The consequence is, Mr. Parrish has been over the community and sixty-five (65) men, reliable, truthful citizens, have signed a petition that Mr. Parrish had drawn up by a magistrate stating that they know Woodie Parrish to be a truthful and honorable citizen. We congratulate Mr. Parrish in his ability to prove that he is truthful and of good character.

Editor Union:

Just a few words to the Republican VOTERS of Chilton Co.: Gentlemen—I want to say to you all that the time has come when the people are going to organize against the schemers and boodlers; and Friday, Sept. 15, is the day set to meet in Thorsby to elect a committee that will represent the people. By so doing we can build up a strong Republican party, a party that believes in progress, and that has some backing. Now, let me persuade every one of you to lay down your work that day, and come to Thorsby and help to elect a good committee, and especially a chairman that will work for the INTEREST of the PARTY, one who will always be ready to call the committee together when the people ask him to do so. Come one, come all, and bring somebody with you, and let us have a hearty handshake and a Republican love feast. Respectfully,

MOSES A. KILLKORE.

BEAT NINE ITEMS.

Editor Union:

We've had a good rain. Picking cotton is our chief industry at present. Lum. Hayes sold his farm to Baz. Foshee and Mr. Smith and bought R. D. Childress' place. Uncle Rube is out of a home at this writing but says J. W. Hays has either got to sell or back out. A. F. Mims, one of our enterprising saw mill men, is the happiest man in this vicinity; it's a 12 1-2 pound girl. Mrs. F. R. Collins is having her residence remodeled and will be strictly up to date. Will Dennis has bought another mule and a "Studebaker" wagon, and says he will haul his own cotton. R. W. Scott and family visited his father-in-law (Mr. Popwell, near Billingsley). Frank Elland made a trip to Clanton Saturday. Rev. S. Smitherman filled his regular appointment at New Salem Saturday and Sunday.

NIM ROD.

THORSBY LETTER.

Rev. Moses, who spent two weeks in Thorsby, during which time he preached several sermons in the Norwegian Lutheran church, has returned to Lawrenceburg, Tenn. On last Wednesday Mr. T. T. Thorson arrived with four land seekers from Leechburg, Pa. Several investments were made before the parties returned to the north. Mr. C. M. Johnson has returned from Michigan. He brought with him Mr. and Mrs. Christenson from Hancock, Mich. They purchased the J. Williams tract of land and have gone to housekeeping. Welcome to Thorsby. The Ladies' Aid Society met last Wednesday. Their work is meeting with great success. Rev. Newton conducted a series of revival meetings at the college hall last week. The meetings ended with a large attendance on Sunday night. Confirmation exercises were conducted in the Norwegian Lutheran church on Sunday morning. There was preaching at the Baptist church in the afternoon. Mr. Paulson and his daughter were visitors in Clanton last week. On Friday night the many friends of Mr. Soberg gave him a pleasant surprise at his home. Mrs. S. A. Thorson and children are visiting friends and relatives here. Messrs. Collins, Robinson and Wilson were Clanton visitors in our town the past week. Miss Lily Carr has returned from Birmingham, where she enjoyed a three week's visit. Mr. Carlson is erecting a fine residence on his farm. There are many cases of fever in and about Thorsby at the present time. Our physician is the busiest man around just now. Mr. Heaton, who is engaged in the saw mill business in Shelby, spent Sunday with his family in Thorsby. The young ladies of Thorsby met at the home of Miss Anna Howard on Wednesday afternoon for the purpose of reorganizing the Sunshine Society. Circuit Clerk Sam W. Collins is very busy about his home here, and it looks like "dem wedding bells were going to ring soon."

CHATTERBOX.

RANDOLPH.

The new cotton crop is coming in. The first bale sold here came from Chilton; was raised by Monroe Atchison, of Mecadonia. Revival services were held last week at the Baptist church. Mr. Parker, of Texas, did the preaching. His sermons were very pointed, plain and practical. Subjects used were, "Preparation to Meet God," something the speaker said all must do (that is, to meet God); "The Value of the Soul;" "Death the Wages of Sin," moral social, intellectual and eternal death being the rewards of sin; "The Sin Against the Holy Spirit," (that is, to attribute to Satan what is really the work of the Holy Spirit). His last subject was "Mother, Home, Children, With Heaven in Prospect." E. Z. Nix and daughter, Miss Laura, were in town Saturday. Mr. and Mrs. Y. O. Freeman, of Hubbard, were among our visitors last week. Z. J. Jones and family went to Oakley's Saturday night. Mrs. Darthulia Gibson, of Mulberry, was in town Monday. Saturday was horse swapping day at Randolph, and of course that brought a crowd. In last week's Union we had something to say about the dying year. How important that we fill the waning season with good works. For the sake of illustration, we would like to refer to some correspondence that appeared away back in the eighties in the Chilton View, in which the writer alluded to the fact that people would spend enough money for a ring to purchase some poor child a pair of shoes. The same is true today. Oh, how much suffering could be relieved if the money used for useless ornaments by religious professors was expended for the relief of suffering humanity. Then let us be looking for opportunities to do good, even if it does require self-denial to do so. Oh, how noble to sacrifice luxuries and useless ornaments to be a benefit to humanity. Self-sacrifice is the way that leads to a reward in the future.

"ONE OF THE BOYS."

LIBERTY HILL.

Everybody well, and good weather for picking cotton. Mr. and Mrs. B Giles visited her mother, Mrs. M. J. Foshee. F. N. Littlejohn and wife were visitors of Mr. L. M. Mims' family Sunday. We had a wedding in this community Sunday; the happy pair were Mr. A. C. Maddox and Miss Della Taylor. Rev. J. W. Gibson performed the ceremony, which was witnessed by many relatives and friends, who all wish the young couple a long and prosperous life together. Success to this union of hearts and hands and our Union paper.

Editor Union:

Rev. R. M. Honeycutt filled his regular appointment here on the second Saturday and Sunday. If we all would follow his advice, we would be better men and women. Mr. James Franklin speaks about his pretty little girls in his Sunday school. He should come up here and take a look at our girls, for instance, T. P. Crowson's, or—well, the list is so long that we won't give any more names, but just come up and look at them in Sunday school 40 strong. J. P. Nix visited in our neighborhood last Sunday. Best wishes for THE UNION.

The Fragrant Lemon.

Lemon trees of California are a thing of beauty and a joy forever. The lemon is the emblem of productiveness. At all seasons of the year can be found on the lemon tree the blossom, the tiny formed lemon and lemons in all stages of growth to the full grown fruit. It is a perpetual bearer. The blossom, the leaf, the wood, the fruit and all parts of the tree are delightfully fragrant.—Country Life in America.

LOCAL AND PERSONAL.

The Clanton High School opened Monday. There was quite a gathering of the friends and patrons, and the school started off with an enrollment of near 80 pupils, several of whom are from other towns in the state. Now, watch it grow until it will fill the two-story brick house which Clanton ought to put up.

F. A. Hannibal, A. E. Jackson and W. L. Jackson, of Lomax, were in Clanton Thursday.

J. E. Barber, the great American well digger, was in Clanton Thursday. He's just returned from a visit north, and is now ready to push the well business for all those who wish a good well of pure water.

W. H. Beam, of Mineral Spring, was in town Thursday.

W. J. Dennis called on us Friday. He's to have the Jody Littlejohn farm next year, and no doubt will do well, for he is a hard worker.

Rev. W. M. Wood was in town Friday and brought THE UNION a pod of pepper that measured 12 1-4 inches by 13 1-2 inches. It hangs in the office where it can be seen by all. You see we give measurements and have the stuff to back them.

Milum Barnes, of Stanton, was in Clanton Saturday. He has the appointment to Mobile Medical college from the county commissioners, and no doubt but what he will do Chilton county credit.

J. H. Ray, O. L. Ray, Walter Dobbs, Willie Dobbs, Walter Popwell, Fred Morgan and Howard Roper, all of Kincheon, were in Clanton Saturday.

J. A. Caddell, of Beat 3, was in town Monday. He has been appointed notary public and justice of the peace for that beat, and hereafter we'll have to call him 'Squire.

G. H. Gerald, of Thorsby, was in Clanton Monday. He's been reappointed notary public. See his advertisement.

A. H. Avery, of Shelby, got on our subscription list Friday. He represents the Shelby Iron Works.

John R. Perkins, of Birmingham was here Friday looking out for the interests of the Sloss-Sheffield Iron and Steel Company.

P. D. Wilson went to Birmingham on business Monday. By the way, his addition to the town of Clanton, comprising some eight squares, is now all platted and any one that wants to build a house in the healthiest part of Clanton had best call on him. The addition runs west of the railroad to Tenth street and north from Fifth avenue.

H. Hardy, of Liberty, was a welcome caller Saturday.

R. L. Culp and son Jodie were pleasant visitors Saturday.

Miss Alpha Smitherman went to Maplesville last week to attend the funeral of her brother, Jap Smitherman, a former sheriff of this county, who has resided in Bessemer a number of years.

J. L. Burnett and son, Samuel, were in Clanton Monday.

E. L. Manning, of Mt. Creek, was a pleasant visitor Monday.

Lum Langston, of Mars Hill, was in town Monday.

Will G. Culp was in Clanton Tuesday.

Judge Reynolds went to Montgomery Tuesday on a business trip. The judge has a heap of irons in the fire these days.

Rev. B. H. Vickers and little Esther were in town Tuesday. We are glad to note that she is improving in health.

The Misses Belle Dennis, Dora Mims, Lucinda Dennis and Lizzie Mims, accompanied by Ernest Dennis, were visitors to Clanton Tuesday.

Rev. W. P. Lowery and son, Lonnie, were in town Tuesday. Mr. Lowery, like a wise man, bought a Studebaker wagon of W. I. Mullins, thereby getting a make that he knows is good, having often seen them tried and never denied.

J. R. Robinson, of Jemison, was in Clanton Tuesday.

Robert W. Littlejohn was a welcome caller Tuesday. He looks well, but says he feels like a widower. Robert, there are as good fish in the sea as ever were caught.

Chancellor W. W. Whitesides held his court here Monday and Tuesday, about the usual routine business being transacted. Attorney Walter Oliver, of Calera, was in attendance on the court.

S. E. Headley was in Clanton Wednesday.

The Chilton Warehouse Company's gin is in full blast these days. The farmers say it is doing good work and cleaning the cotton off the seed. W. H. Conway is in charge of the gin and proposes to give every one a "square deal."

Lawyer Smith has lost his partner, but he says that he is at the same stand and will attend to all the business that may be brought to him, and carry it (if possible) to a successful conclusion. He is not so wealthy that he will not take the smallest case, if justice will be served thereby.

Cotton picking is all the go. Mr. W. P. Murrah is improving fast, and can now go round looking after his business. Now, farmers, hold your cotton; do as the Cotton Association has asked us to do, and hold your cotton for at least 11 cents, the minimum price fixed by the association. MOUNT PLEASANT.

Rev. W. P. Lowery officiated at the first religious service held in Mount Pleasant school house on last Sunday evening. A large congregation was in attendance. Prof. James Thomas will teach the first school here. A Sunday school was formed here Sunday with 46 pupils on the roll, and W. P. Lowery as superintendent; G. H. Massey, secretary. Rev. W. J. REPUBLICAN MEETING.

The Republican meeting called at Thorsby for the 15th should be well attended, and the party should get together and present a solid front to our democratic opponents. Every one turn out and let's have a rousing big meeting, which will be a forerunner of success next year. Chilton county does not need a democratic sheriff and will not elect one.

Demopolis, Ala.—Col. N. G. Winn, of this city, who is one of the interested parties in the Mobile and West Alabama Railroad, has just received a letter from the firm in New York which has been negotiating finances for building the road, saying there is no question but that the road will be built.

Hall of Clanton Lodge,
No. 423, A. F. & A. M.,
Sept. 2, 1905.

To the W. M., Wardens and Brethren of Clanton Lodge, No. 423, A. F. & A. M.

We, the undersigned committee appointed to draft and present resolutions upon the death of our deceased brother, Enoch A. Knight, beg leave to submit the following: Brother Enoch Asbury Knight was born in Talladega county, near Talladega Springs, this state, in the year 1840, and departed this life at his home near Clanton on Saturday, the 29th day of July, 1905. Brother Knight was 65 years of age on the 22d day of March, 1905. When a young man Bro. Knight moved to Coosa county, and in 1868 moved to Chilton county. Bro. Knight became a member of the Methodist church at the age of 12 years. He faithfully served in the confederate army during the entire civil war. Bro. Knight was ENTERED, PASSED and RAISED in Amand Lodge, No. 250, at Coopers and affiliated with this Lodge in 1893. He was made a Royal Arch Mason in Clanton Chapter, No. 116, on April 16, 1904. He has served in several stations in this Lodge, and at the time of his death he was Tyler of his Lodge and Sentinel of his chapter. He was a zealous Mason and an honest and upright man. Bro Knight was buried with all Masonic honors at New Salem church on Sunday, July 30, 1905. Therefore be it Resolved: By this Lodge, that we extend to the family of our deceased brother our earnest and heartfelt sympathy in the irreparable loss which they have sustained. Be it further resolved, That Clanton Lodge has lost one of its most consistent and valuable members, and that we deeply deplore his sudden and unexpected death, and that Clanton Lodge will always remember with pleasure his regular attendance upon his Lodge, and his affable and genial manner. Be it further resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be presented to the family of our deceased brother, and also published in our county papers.

Respectfully submitted,
J. P. VAN DERVEER,
E. A. MATTHEWS,
WALLACE C. EDLER.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is hit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

Send Us Three Names,

Or five of you may club together, sending a dollar bill and 25 good names and addresses, and get five trial trip subscriptions. Learn how to clip the Trust's wings. Address

OLDER THAN SPHINX

48 NATURAL SCULPTURE IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Marvel of Nature Well Described by Poet of a Past Generation—Formed Thousands of Years Before the Time of Adam.

King wrote of the Profile as he did of all the wonders of the New Hampshire mountains, from the keenest sense of their beauty and grandeur, and in the hope of making others realize how near to their doors were splendors of nature as marvelous as could be found in any other part of the world. The following extract is from his book, "The White Hills," 1859:

If the inclosing walls of Franconia Notch were less grand, and the water gems less lovely, travelers would be still, perhaps, as strongly attracted to the spot, that they might see a mountain which breaks into human expression—a piece of sculpture older than the Sphinx—an intimation of the human countenance, which is the crown of all beauty, that was pushed out from the coarse strata of New England, thousands of years before Adam.

The marvel of this circumstance, outlined so distinctly against the sky, at an elevation of nearly 1,500 feet above the road, is greatly increased by the fact that it is composed of three masses of rock which are not in perpendicular line with each other. On the brow of the mountain itself, standing on the visor of the helmet that covers the face or directly underneath it, on the shore of the little lake, there is no intimation of any human features in the lawless rocks. Remove but a few rods either way from the guideboard on the road, where you are advised to look up, and the charm is dissolved.

The whole profile is about 80 feet in length, and of the three separate masses of rock which are combined in its composition, one forms the forehead, another the nose and upper lip, and the third the chin. The best time to see the Profile is about 4 in the afternoon of a summer day. Then, standing by the little lake at the base and looking up, one fulfils the appeal of our great transcendental poet in a literal sense, in looking at the jutting rocks and

Through their granite seeming

The expression is really noble, with a suggestion partly of fatigue and melancholy. The upper portion of the mouth looks a little weak, as though the front teeth had decayed, and the granite lip had consequently fallen in. Those who can see it with a thunder cloud behind, and the slaty scud driving thin across it, will carry away the grandest impression which it ever makes on the beholder's mind. But when, after an August shower, late in the afternoon, the mists that rise from the forests below, congregate around it, and, smitten with sunshine, break as they drift against its nervous outline and hiding the mass of the mountain which it overhangs, isolate it with a thin halo, the countenance, awful but benignant, "is as if a mighty angel were sitting among the hills and enrobing himself in a vesture of gold and purple."

The whole mountain from which the Profile starts is one of the noblest specimens of majestic rock that can be seen in New Hampshire. One may tire of the craggy countenance sooner than of the sublime front and vigorous slopes of Manet canyon itself—especially as it is seen with its great patches of tawny color, in driving up from the lower part of the Notch to the Profile house. Yet the interest of the mountain to visitors has been so concentrated in the Profile that very few have studied and enjoyed the nobler grandeur on which that countenance is only a fantastic freak.

Chickens Quickly Hatched Out.

P. P. Paquette of Williamstown claims to have hatched out chickens in thirteen days. Some one gave him the setting and at the end of thirteen days the chicks appeared. Of course the eggs must have been in a state of incubation when Paquette received them, but the surprise certainly set him thinking for a while.

World's Largest Plant.

The largest plant in the world is probably a species of seaweed, which often attains a length of 300 feet. The stems are dried and used as ropes by the South Sea islanders.

HISTORIC BUILDING IN MAINE.

Farmhouse Has Had More Than Century of Life.

Here is a picture of one of Maine's historic buildings, which has stood over a century and is now falling in decay. This is one of the oldest farmhouses in Hebron. It is historic for two reasons. At this very house the greater part of the flooring timbers for the original Bowery theater in New York city were hewn and framed. Also, Prof. Oscar Allen, the first American to know the secret composition for making nickel and the first to introduce nickel plating in this country, was born and brought up on this farm.

The timbers for the Bowery theater were cut in the forests around Hebron, and were taken to this house to be hewn and framed. Levi Allen, a carpenter and contractor from New York, was sent to do the work. He came in the winter of 1825-26, and with the aid of his brother, then living on the old farm, hewed and fitted the timbers. They were hauled by ox teams to Portland, then transported by vessel from there to New York city.

Prof. Allen, an expert chemist, after graduating from Yale college, began work for a concern in Ohio which had about $30,000 invested for the purpose of nickel plating. The stock of material was found worthless when it was discovered that no one knew how to work it. Prof. Allen had a college friend in Germany, where nickel plating was carried on. He was sent from this country to Germany to visit his friend, and after staying until he had learned the secret process he returned home. This was the first successful attempt at nickel plating in America.

OLDEST LETTER IS FOUND.

Written on Lead 400 Years B. C. and Discovered in Attica.

What is said to be the oldest letter in the world has been found in some excavations in ancient Attica. M. Wilhelm, secretary of the Austrian Archaeological institute, who succeeded in deciphering it, asserts that it was written four centuries before Christ. It is engraved on a leaden leaf, folded in two, and it bears on the outside the following address:

"To the porter of the market at Potis, to be delivered either to Nausias or to Thrasicles, or to their sons."

The text of the letter is as follows:

"Mnesiangos sends his greetings to those in the house and informs them that he is in good health. Please send me a blanket or some sheepskins, if possible, of the ordinary kind, without ornaments. As soon as the occasion offers I shall return them."

Flew Far to Old Home.

The retentive powers of the carrier pigeon are wonderful. Over a year ago C. B. Woodbury of Cornish, Me., purchased a bird from a man in Wakefield. The bird was mated and seemed perfectly contented in his new home at Cornish and his owner felt confident that he would return to his loft when he was released a few miles from home. The bird, however, flew straight to his old home in Wakefield, 150 miles away.

Lightning Struck One Red Flower.

During a storm at Bucyrus, Ohio, lightning struck an iron hitching post in front of the David Krauter residence. The post was destroyed and the main part of the bolt jumped to a bed of dahlias, in the center of which stood one red blossom. None of the white flowers were injured, but the red one and its stalk were wiped out.

Lives in Tree.

A Massachusetts man lives in a house in a tree in summer.

Pickerel Too Eager for Prey.

A young woman fishing from a wharf at Lake Penacook, N. H., hooked a two-pound bass. As she swung the fish clear of water a pickerel, weighing one pound, made a rush for the disappearing bass and caught it by the tail. The pickerel was unable to let go its grip before both were landed on the wharf.

Kept Close to Home.

At East Palmyra, Me., has resided for twenty years a woman, and within two miles of her home runs a road that she has never been on. About two miles in another direction is a pond, and until a few days ago this woman did not know that such a pond was in existence.

GEESE CATCH HIS FISH.

Scotchman's Simple and Unique Labor-Saving Device.

"An old Scotchman and neighbor of mine," said a resident of Greenwood Lake, "has a method of taking fresh water fish which, to my way of thinking, excels all others for the ease, repose and success with which it is conducted. The fisherman desires, we will say, a mess of bass, pickerel or pike, with which the waters are amply stocked. Well, he simply goes to his barnyard and selects a big goose, or half a dozen geese, as the case may be, and ties a baited line about five feet long to their feet.

"On reaching the edege of the lake, with a basket containing one or more geese, the fisherman turns the birds into the water. The geese swim out, and the old Scotchman lights his pipe and sits down. In a few minutes a fish sees the bait and seizes it, giving the goose a good pull. Then the bird starts for the shore at full speed, frightened half to death, dragging the fish upon the bank, where it it unhooked."

CANNIBALS UP TO DATE.

Man-Eating Tribe Has Some Ideas of Civilization.

The man-eating Battas of North Sumatra have a postal system. They make use of hollow tree trunks at cross roads, and these primitive letter boxes are largely patronized by young men and women, who read, and write, and correspond in a degraded native script, which is traced on palm leaves in vertical lines that run upwards and from left to right.

These Battas, though undoubted cannibals, are skilled in agriculture and in raising stock. They form large communities, have an organized government, hereditary chiefs, popular assemblies, and a written civil and penal code. Their picturesque dwellings have been compared to Swiss chalets, and the ground floor is reserved for their live stock. For their skill in iron work, pottery, and weaving they are probably indebted to Hindu teaching, and their repulsive habit is combined with a belief in a triune deity, Creator, Preserver and Destroyer.

Working in Midair.

Some five hundred persons in Herald square the other day watched William Webber at work on a flagstaff about one hundred and seventy-five feet directly above the pavement, momentarily expecting to see the young man dashed to death on the pavement below. The staff was inclined at an angle of about sixty degrees. A photographer who chanced to be near climbed up nine stories in the building over which Webber was working and took the above photograph, which virtually shows the workman at his trade in the clouds.—New York Herald.

Bullfrog Ate Chickens.

A chicken-eating bullfrog has been captured near New York. It weighs three pounds and is fifteen inches long. The ordinary weight of a bullfrog is about a half pound.

Levi Bott, who lives near the Morris canal, just out of town, has a fowl yard full of young chicks—that is, he did have a yardful, but the chicks have been disappearing at the rate of two or three a day for two weeks. Bott set traps for the rat or ferret he suspected, but caught nothing. Yesterday a boy told him that he had seen a great big bullfrog leap among a flock of chickens, grab one by the leg and haul it into the water.

Bott rigged a pole with the regulation piece of red flannel, fluttered it on the surface of the water, while he hid behind a bush, and in twenty minutes had lodged the frog.

Trout Without Hearing.

In discussing whether or not trout hear, a correspondent of the Amateur Sportsman asserts that they do not. In his opinion their sensitiveness to approaching danger is due solely to the vibration of the earth along the stream and the consequent vibration of the water. Thus persons standing perfectly still are able to talk and laugh with impunity when the slightest bodily movement of either will frighten the shy fish

Pennsylvania's Tin Church.

York, Penn., is probably the only town in the world which can boast a tin church. When the congregation determined to build they investigated the cost of materials and found that stone, brick and lumber were beyond their means. Some one suggested block tin, and the house was built. The edifice is 40 by 50 and cost $1,500. It is painted in imitation of brick.

NOTE WORKING OF ENGINE.

Testing Device in Operation by an Eastern Railroad.

An odd thing to be seen in the operating department of the New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad is what the trainmen call a "bird box" engine. It is a new and very powerful locomotive of the compound type, and it is given the appearance shown in the accompanying photograph by the erection of an affair of wood over one of the cylinders, in which affair an inspector sits and makes a record of the working of the machinery about the head end of the engine while it is in motion and while the train is speeding on the run between New York and Boston. The operation is being carried on for the purpose of making a comparative test of the compound with the new type of "ten wheeled" single cylinder engines which have been put into use on this road.

HABITS OF THE DOVE.

"Billing," Writer Thinks, Corresponds to Our Kissing.

An Englishman, Edmond Selous, has been watching doves at play and in combat. Of the habit of "billing," in which so many birds engage when they are nesting, he says: "Where birds now merely 'bill,' they once, in my opinion, fed each other—or the male fed the female—but pleasure came to be experienced in the contact alone and the passage of food, which was never necessary, gradually became obsolete. I think it by no means improbable that our own kissing may have originated in much the same way and that birds, when thus 'billing,' experience the same sort of pleasure that we do when we kiss must be quite obvious to any one who has watched them."

Of a peculiarity of the stock dove Mr. Selous writes: "When these birds fight they constantly interrupt the flow of the combat by bowing in the most absurd way, not to one another, but, generally, so to speak, for no object or purpose whatever, apparently, but only because they must do so. The fact is, the bow has become a formula of courtship and as courting and fighting are intimately connected the one suggests the other in the mind of the bird, who bows, all at once, under a misconception."

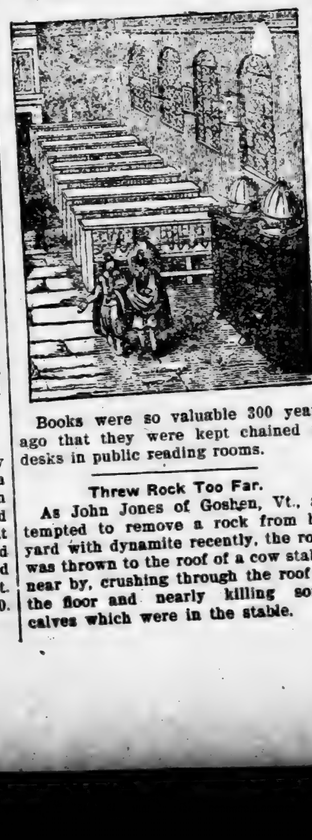
Chinese Burial Customs.

When a rich and important Chinaman dies, his funeral is conducted with much pomp and splendor. His friends and relations, instead of sending wreaths, send innumerable banners. These are made of white silk, with inscriptions beautifully worked in black velvet, and express the senders' good wishes to the deceased himself or to the members of his family for many generations. On the day of the funeral these banners are carried by hired men who are all dressed alike for the occasion. After the funeral, which lasts several hours at the cemetery, is over, the banners are all brought back, and eventually grace the rooms of the late Chinaman's house.

Hen a Hard Worker.

James A. Edwards of Apponaug, R. I., has a pet hen which has the freedom of the house. She has her nest in a corner of the woodbox which does away with the possibility of any other hen sharing her honors. For a long time this remarkable hen has laid double-yoked eggs, but last Thursday she surpassed all records by laying three eggs in one day.

Public Reading Room in 1616.



Books were so valuable 300 years ago that they were kept chained to desks in public reading rooms.

Threw Rock Too Far.

As John Jones of Goshen, Vt., attempted to remove a rock from his yard with dynamite recently, the rock was thrown to the roof of a cow stable near by, crushing through the roof to the floor and nearly killing some calves which were in the stable.

FEEDING PETS OF THE ZOO.

Plentiful and Varied Supply of Eatables Required.

Catering to animals requires both a plentiful and varied supply of foods, as can be seen from this report of material used at the London Zoological Gardens last year. For the flesh-eating animals there were supplied 144 tons of horse flesh, and nearly nine tons of goat flesh, and 9,539 chicken heads. Fourteen and a half tons of fish, in addition to 1,260 pints of shrimps, furnished the waterfowl with their dainty fare, while 297 loads of hay and 6,030 bunches of greens supplied the ruminants. Other items on the list were 972 pounds of grapes, 498 pounds of sugar, 6,262 loaves of bread, 5,086 quarts of milk, 393 pounds of crackers, and more than 33,000 eggs. The chicken heads were for the members of the rat family, the eggs for the birds and the shrimps formed the easiest way to the affections of the flamingoes.

HATCHED OUT TURTLE'S EGGS.

Unfortunate Cat Unwittingly Served as Incubator.

Alonzo Murphy of Pochuck, Pa., captured a snapping turtle recently which his wife made into soup. The family cat was given a portion of the carcass and a number of eggs, which were found in the reptile.

Soon after the cat died. While Mr. Murphy was burying the animal the fur at the stomach parted and eleven small turtles emerged one after the other.

Mr. Murphy's theory is that the cat had swallowed the turtle eggs whole and, being unable to digest them on account of the shells, the stomach of the cat acted as an incubator and hatched the eggs.

Then the young turtles clawed and bit their way to freedom, killing the cat.

BONFIRE FOR THE FOURTH.

Town of Salem, Mass., Keeps Up Good Old Custom.

In past years it has been a custom in Salem, Mass., to have a monster bonfire on Gallows Hill for the creation of which the city appropriated the sum of $100. The illustration shows one of these great Fourth of July piles of barrels and boxes, standing ninety-six feet high. In firing it the torch is applied at the top and sides, also at the bottom, and in time the flames leap about the entire mass. The spectacle created is one of inspiration and excitement, the heavens being illumined all around. Many places throughout the United States have bonfires on Fourth of July, but it is likely that few places delight the heart of the small boy to the extent that this great bonfire on Gallows Hill does.

Long Distance Courtships.

Sketching one day in Burma, an English artist noticed a man a little distance off glaring straight ahead of him at some object he could not see from his position. The man sat with the same fixed glare the whole afternoon and was at it again next morning. The artist had the curiosity to ask an English visitor what it meant. The reply was: "Oh, he is in love!" And it was explained that this was their method of courtship. The object of the man's attentive gaze was a girl in a neighboring bazaar. When a young man falls in love, he has to seat himself at a certain distance from his adored one and wait for her to do the rest. If she looks in his direction once or twice on the first or second day, he is wildly encouraged, and if on the third day she nod to him and smiles it is time to go to the parents with reference to the marriage settlements.

Coincidence in Names.

A coincidence in the matter of names has just come to light in the case of Capt. Oscar Olsen, who is about to take command of the steamer Idaho. Capt. Olsen was wrecked last April when the barge Texas went ashore on Block island. He has just recovered from that experience and has just learned that the Idaho, his first command since the wreck, was formerly the State of Texas.

Cards Left on Graves.

It is becoming fashionable in Paris to leave cards at the cemetery. An oak box placed on a tombstone is intended for the cards of those who visit the resting place of a departed friend. In this way the near relatives find out those friends who still cherish the memory of the dead.

ONLY TWO $60 BILLS EX[ISTENCE]

Issued in 1812, They Are Worth [$1,000] Apiece at Present Time.

The only two sixty dollar bills in existence have been found. One belongs to an Eastern collector and the other to Mrs. Julia Turton of St. Louis. They are worth $1,000 each.

"My mother was a Bryant," said Mrs. Turton, "and the bill was one of several paid to my grandfather, [Col.] John N. Bryant, who fought in the war of 1812, by the father of Mark Twain. The payment was made in connection with a land claim in Tennessee, the details of which I have never been able to learn. The bill was an inheritance of mine, and I never realized its value until I saw a mention of it in a dispatch. I value it as a family heirloom."

Stock Exchange Elephant.

Though bulls and bears and even lambs are frequently seen in the stock exchange, members of this body probably were never before visited by other menagerie pets until a short time back, when a baby elephant paid a call at the exchange. This pachyderm, however, came not of its own free will, but was led to the scene by Sylvationist Smith. Mr. Smith wanted to secure a subscription for his army's self-denial fund, so requests were made by make-believe Jumbo. The novelty of the presentation resulted in attention, and, best of all, generous donations.—New York Herald.

Fish Report by Telephone.

An English paper reports that a Norwegian has invented a telephone by which the noise made by fish in the depths of the ocean can be heard. The instrument consists of a microphone in a hermetically sealed wooden box. It is connected with a telephone on shipboard by electric wires, etc. The sound in the water being intensified by the microphone. The inventor asserts that with its aid the presence of fish, and approximately their number and kind, can be recognized. Whether herrings or smaller fish are encountered in large numbers they make a whistling noise and the sound made by codfish is more like howling. When they come near the submarine the telephone their motion can be distinguished. The flow of water through the gills produces a noise similar to labored breathing and the motion of the fins a rolling sound.—Richard Guenther, consul general, Frankfort, Germany.

Child Lay Safely Under Train.

A little girl of two and a half years has just had a wonderful escape from death near Cardross, England. While she was at play she rolled upon the railway track and went down between the rails. A freight train traveling at high speed came [along] and although the driver applied the brakes, the whole train passed over the child before it could be stopped. When she was then found she was lying in the bottom of a cutting uninjured. So impossible is it for drivers of trains in Great Britain to see anything between the cowcatchers, that the child must have rolled much farther than it appeared to have done.

He had no weapons with him and being accompanied by [a dog] he decided not to [interfere] fearing an encounter with the mother, who was probably [near] by.

Curious Lion Portrait.

Even the camel will balk when [asked] to make a portrait of animals of the jungle. Lions and beasts. The [artist] however, is good enough to be classed as a work of art. In order to overcome the exposure and eliminate the [glare] bars the lens was placed between [two] of them and the attention of the beasts distracted until it was time to open the shutter.

Largest Flower in the World.

The largest flower in the world, it is said is the bolo, which grows on the Island of Mindanao, one of the Philippine group. It has five petals, measuring nearly a yard in width. A single flower has been known to weigh twenty-two pounds. It grows on the highest branch of the tree, about 2,000 feet above the sea.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR SEPTEMBER 17.

Subject: Daniel in Babylon, Dan. 1., 8-20 —Golden Text, Dan. 1., 8 — Memory Verses, 16-17 — Commentary on the Day's Temperance Lesson.

I. The temptation. These young men were confronted with a powerful temptation. A desire to obey the king's commandment, love of popularity, appetite, a desire to succeed—these were strong attractions. They were slaves in a strange land, and was it not necessary to fall in with the customs of the people? They were tempted (1) to do that which was degrading; (2) to disobey the law of their God; (3) to deny their religions and God and fall in with idolatrous worship.

II. The temptation resisted (v. 8). 8. "Purposed in his heart." He decided what he would do and then took the wisest possible way to accomplish it. At first he made only a simple request. It was not political strategy; his actions were not planned to catch the eyes of the king. The first emotion of his heart was loyalty to God; this led to his resolution. Daniel did not trifle with God or his conscience. They changed his name, but could not change his nature. "Would not defile himself." The Hebrew who ate without restriction at Nebuchadnezzar's table could not but defile himself. "Nor with the wine." He feared the degradation which would follow from wine drinking. "He requested." Observe the courtesy, and yet he was inflexible. "The prince," etc. Ashpenaz (v. 3), chief chamberlain.

III. The ten days' rest (vs. 9-16). 9. "Into favor." Ashpenaz saw that Daniel was a young man of integrity and noble, loving character. His person was beautiful and doubtless his manners were attractive. The best way to please others is to please God first. 10. "I fear—the king." He does not positively refuse the favor which Daniel seeks. This appeal by Ashpenaz was very persuasive; and while Daniel did not wish to imperil the life of his benefactor, yet he felt that it was safe to do right and that God would deliver them.

11. "Melzar." This is not a proper name, but should be read "the melzar," the chief butler, or steward, the one who had charge of their food. 12. "Prove." Test us; experiment for a short time and watch the result. "Give us pulse." A vegetable diet, with water instead of wine.

13. "Then—deal with thy servants." These words were spoken with quiet confidence as to the result. A number of other boys besides these four were undergoing the same training. A fair test, to place these young abstainers beside those who partook of the royal banquets, and see which company presented the most vigorous appearance. 14. "Ten days." This would afford ample time to show the effect of steady, good food on their health. Daniel had strong faith in God, and he felt sure that he and his companions would present the best appearance. 15. "Fairer and fatter." The complexion was healthier and clearer. God meant that if a man would be intemperate he should himself proclaim it to the world. The glutton, the drunkard, the debauchee, carry the stamp of their deeds upon their features. A depraved character corrupts the flesh that carries it.

IV. Honored by God and man (vs. 17-20). 17. "God gave them knowledge," etc. 1. Through the highest physical condition which made their minds clear. 2. By imparting it to them directly, as the visions recorded later. 3. By giving His blessing to their daily studies, aiding their minds by His Spirit, opening wider doors to knowledge through His providence. 4. By keeping them from those vices, from conceit and selfishness, which distort the judgment and dim the perception of truth. Whatever we may give to God of faith, or work, or trust, or love, or zeal, He gives back again with large interest, good measure, pressed down and shaken together and running over—ten, twenty, thirty, sixty or an hundred fold, in whatever we need most from Him. "In all learning." "In science, astronomy, literature, philosophy, the Chaldeans stood at this time at the head of the world. They had the beginnings of chemistry and even of the telescope." "In all visions," etc. God gave a double portion to Daniel. He was endued with a prophetical spirit, by which he was enabled to converse with God and to receive the notices of divine things in dreams and visions. Visions were revelations to the prophets when awake, and dreams when asleep. God thus made one of the despised covenant people eclipse the Chaldean sages in the very science on which they most prided themselves. So Joseph, in the court of Pharaoh (Gen. 40:5; 41:1-8).

18. "End of the days." After three years (v. 5), the time fixed for their training. 19. "King communed." Talked with them, tested their progress, learning and talents. He put them through a test examination. "Before the king." "To be his personal advisers and among the leading officers of the kingdom. All officers and servants stood when in the presence of the monarch." 20. "Ten times better." Probably a high court of learning was held, at which the king presided and the nobles and sages of the land assisted. These proposed difficult questions, which the youths readily answered and were in turn allowed to put questions which the sages could not answer. They were better counselors and better informed than the others. Daniel continued in influence and authority, at different times, during the whole of the seventy years of captivity. It is commonly believed that when the captives returned he remained in Chaldea, probably detained by his employment in the Persian empire, and that he died in Babylon.

Educational Rally.

Lewisburg, Tenn.—An educational rally was held Saturday at Verona, in this county, which was largely attended by teachers, every section of the county being represented. An interesting program was rendered, and addresses were delivered by State Superintendent Mynders and others.

An English burglar says that the fraternity never rob a house in which a squint-eyed servant is employed.

Perfecting the Microscope.

Improvement of the microscope has been the air of recent inventors. In the ultra microscope a new method of illumination gives visibility to particles heretofore outside of the line of sight, and in the still later ultra-violet microscope the mode of illumination is a chief feature. The second instrument uses light of a wave-length of 275, while the shortest wave-length is 550. The difference depends upon the quartz lenses, the source of light being cadmium electrodes, and the detail obtainable with the short rays is remarkable. The naked eye sees nothing through such a microscope, an eyepiece containing a flourescent screen being necessary to convert the rays and make visible a picture of the object in green. The flourescent screen is only for focussing, however, and the real objects are obtained by photography, the plates being very sensitive to the rays from the cadmium electrodes. The results differ much from those of ordinary illumination, some structures being penetrated by the cadium rays, while others are not.

Belgium's Population.

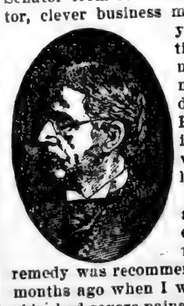
Belgium still retains the distinction of being the most densely populated country in Europe. Consul McNally, at Liege, reports the final footings of the present census, fixing the population at 7,074,910. Of these 3,514,491 are males and 3,560,419 females. Thus, Belgium has 45,828 more females than males.

The population of the leading cities is as follows: Antwerp, 291,949; Brussels, 194,196; Liege, 168,532; Ghent, 162,482; Mechen, 58,101; Bruges, 63,728; Verviers, 49,158; Louvain, 42,194; Ostend, 41,181.

U. S. SENATOR TOWNE

Credits Doan's Kidney Pills With a Gratifying Cure.

Hon. Charles A. Towne, Ex-U. S. Senator from Minnesota, brilliant orator, clever business man, brainy lawyer, whose national prominence made him a formidable candidate for the Presidential nomination in 1904, writes us the following:



Gentlemen — I am glad to endorse Doan's Kidney Pills. The remedy was recommended to me a few months ago when I was feeling miserable; had severe pains in the back; was restless and languid; had a dull headache and neuralgic pains in the limbs and was otherwise distressed. A few boxes of the pills effectually routed my ailment and I am glad to acknowledge the benefit I derived.

Royal Cook Decorated.

King Edward's chef, M. Menager, was among those to receive birthday honor on the occasion of his majesty's recent birthday. He is believed to be among the most accomplished chefs in the world. He was decorated with the Victorian medal. Other recipients of that distinction are understood to feel that in conferring the medal on a cook King Edward has rather cheapened the honor.

YELLOW CRUST ON BABY

Would Crack Open and Scab Causing Terrible Itching—Cured by Cuticura.

"Our baby had a yellow crust on his head which I could not keep away. When I thought I had succeeded in getting his head clear, it would start again by the crown of his head, crack and scale, and cause terrible itching. I then got Cuticura Soap and Ointment, washing the scalp with the soap and then applying the Ointment. A few treatments made a complete cure. I have advised many mothers to use Cuticura, when I have been asked about the same ailment of their babies. Mrs. John Boyce, Pine Brush, N. Y."

The discovery of the method of preserving the brilliancy of fish scales has led to a considerable export trade from Russia. The scales are used for the making of artificial pearls and similar articles.

FRUITFUL FURNACES.

INTENSE HEAT PRODUCES PRECIOUS STONES.

Scientists Have Succeeded in Plucking Real Diamonds and Rubies From the Crucible of the Furnace.

Recent advices from France state that Professor Moissan, the eminent scientist and inventor, has actually succeeded in making genuine diamonds and rubies. He employs for this purpose the electric furnace, which has been so improved that a degree of heat can be produced approaching the extreme temperatures which were undoubtedly a factor in the formation of minerals and gems in the interior of the earth.

The rubies obtained are of large size, weighing ten or fifteen carats, and in quality and color equal and even surpass those found in the earth. The natural forces attending the formation of diamonds seem to have been more complicated, and so far the diamonds resulting from the efforts of the scientists have been very small, but still they are positively identified as the carbon crystal—the diamond. They are remarkably clear and bright, and on a small scale as fine specimens as nature's own product.

The electric furnace has enriched chemistry with a whole series of new compounds. Probably the one of most value to mankind at large is Calcium Carbide. The simple application of water to Calcium Carbide generates the gas Acetylene, which is now being commonly used for lighting.

The peculiar merits of Acetylene light are its brilliance and high candle power, ease of installation, economy and its adaptability for lighting buildings of every description regardless of their location.

Gorki's Real Name.

The real name of Maxim Gorki, the Russian author, is Alexei Maximovit Pjesjkov. He is now about 37 years of age, and he won his first pronounced literary success with a short story published 12 years ago. He is in the artisan class, and at the age of 10 was apprenticed to a shoemaker. He ran away from this employer, as he did later from a designer. Subsequently he was by turns a painter of holy images, cook's assistant on a Volga steamer, baker, apple dealer, peddler of beer, lawyer's clerk, chorus singer, herdsman and reporter. In 1892 a broken down student suggested that he turn author. Next year his first successful story appeared.

Aged Miner's Record.

Patrick Sweeney, a 70-year-old miner residing at Coaldale, Pa., claims to have the most remarkable record of any miner in the world. He has, according to his figures, driven nine miles of gangway himself and mined enough coal to supply the country for half a year. During this time he was never seriously injured, but he assisted in carrying from the mines 115 men who had been killed and 300 injured. In his home town he has for many years been looked upon as being the leading citizen. He has acted as pallbearer at 997 funerals and has stood sponsor of 714 children.

PAINFUL PERIODS

AMERICAN WOMEN FIND RELIEF

The Case of Miss Irene Crosby Is One of Thousands of Cures Made by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

How many women realize that menstruation is the balance wheel of a woman's life, and while no woman is entirely free from periodical suffering, it is not the plan of nature that women should suffer so severely.

Thousands of American women, however, have found relief from all monthly suffering by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as it is the most thorough female regulator known to medical science. It cures the condition which causes so much discomfort and robs menstruation of its terrors.

Miss Irene Crosby, of 313 Charlton Street East Savannah, Ga., writes:

"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is a true friend to woman. It has been of great benefit to me, curing me of irregular and painful menstruation when everything else had failed, and I gladly recommend it to other suffering women."

Women who are troubled with painful or irregular menstruation, backache, bloating (or flatulence), leucorrhœa, falling, inflammation or ulceration of the uterus, ovarian troubles, that "bearing-down" feeling, dizziness, faintness, indigestion, nervous prostration or the blues, should take immediate action to ward off the serious consequences, and be restored to perfect health and strength by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and then write to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., for further free advice. Thousands have been cured by so doing.

A FEW CUTTING REMARKS

The purpose of a saw is to cut. It should cut easily, cut cleanly, and cut with every movement.

I prefer an Atkins Saw. Its blade is "Silver Steel", recognized the world over as the finest crucible steel ever made in ancient or modern times. It is hard, close-grained and tough. It holds a sharp cutting edge longer than any other Saw. Its blade tapers perfectly from thick to thin, from handle to tip. Thus it makes leeway for itself, runs easily and does not buckle. Its temper is perfect. When bent by a crooked thrust, it springs into shape without kinking.

The Atkins Saw cuts—and does it best of any. We make all types and sizes of saws, but only one grade—the best.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for more sickness and suffering than any other disease; therefore, when, through neglect or other cause, kidney trouble is permitted to continue, fatal results are sure to follow.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorders of these most important organs.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking GILBERT'S GRAVEL WEED COMPOUND, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. GENERAL STATE NEWS.

Current News Garnered as It Falls From the Plant of Report.

Corner Stone Laid.

Tuskegee, Ala.—The exercises attending the laying of the corner stone of the Masonic temple took place here Monday afternoon at 3:30 p. m., presided over by R. S. Teague, of Montgomery, grand commander of the Grand Commandery of Knight Templars of Alabama, who represented the most worshipful grand master of the state.

On the corner stone are inscribed the words: "Masonic Temple, erected 1905 by Tuskegee Lodge, 57, A. F. and A. M., and James E. Cobb Chapter, No. 129."

The laying of this corner stone no doubt marks the beginning of a new era in the Masonic history of Tuskegee.

Killed By a Woman.

Dothan, Ala.—Joe Taylor was shot and killed by Laura Harris at Cottonwood, ten miles below here, Wednesday. Taylor is said to have gone to the home of the woman intending to raise a quarrel. On finding the doors locked, he is said to have attempted to force an entrance, when the woman killed him with a shotgun. The woman has been placed in jail.

The Enterprise Lumber Company, which is building the road from Dothan to St. Andrews Bay, has located the large mills here and is getting them up as fast as possible. W. S. Wilson, who is doing the grading, has about ten miles graded.

While playing in the yard Monday the 4-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Jack Gresham was kicked by a horse. He kicked the boy just above the eye and crushed the skull and it was thought for a day or so he could not live, but up to now he is living and may get well.

The cotton crop in this section is the poorest for many years. It will barely make a half crop and it will soon all be picked out. All other crops are good.

Laying Court House Corner Stone.

Prattville, Ala.—The largest crowd ever gathered in Prattville witnessed the ceremonies of laying the corner stone of the court house Thursday. Early in the morning people from the country began to arrive, and by 10 o'clock there were 2,000 people waiting for the beginning of the ceremonies.

The orator of the day, Dr. R. M. Cunningham, was introduced by G. C. Spiegen, and after prayer by the Rev. John R. Caldwell, the band played "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and the people joined singing. The doctor made an appropriate address, which was well received. The box deposited in the corner stone contained many interesting bits of history of Autauga county and Prattville.

When the corner stone was lowered to its place the people repaired to Magnolia Grove, where was provided a bountiful barbecue dinner. There were estimated to have been 2,500 or 3,000 persons who partook of this dinner. There were preparations made for 3,500 to 4,000. There was nothing to mar the occasion and the pleasures of the day were complete.

Good Institution.

Evergreen, Ala.—The thirteenth annual session of the Alabama Agricultural school opened on last Monday with a large number of pupils, patrons and friends of the school present.

An appropriate programme of exercises had been arranged by President J. A. Liner, which included short but pointed talks from Rev. C. S. Talley, Rev. J. W. Stewart, Hon. J. F. Jones, Rev. A. G. Moseley and President Liner. The exercises were interspersed with a beautiful vocal solo by Miss Lucie Daughdrille, of Marion, and instrumental selections by Mrs. Taylor, of Selma; Misses Pearl Williamson and Dorothy McCreary, of Evergreen.

The work of the school began on Tuesday with more than two hundred pupils present, and the prospects are that three hundred will have matriculated by the first of October. Prof. W. W. Monroe from Fayette, Ala., and Prof. S. Greer from Pikeville, Tenn., have returned to resume their work in the school. Their families will follow later.

Miss Lucy Lowe Dead.

Huntsville, Ala.—Miss Lucy Lowe, a prominent member of the Huntsville chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy, died very suddenly Wednesday afternoon. Miss Lowe was a sister of Miss Sarah Lowe and of the late William Lowe, member of congress from the Eighth Alabama district. She was a daughter of the late Gen. B. M. Lowe.

Death at Aberfoil.

Aberfoil, Ala.—Calvin J. Smith died at his home near here Wednesday. He had been a resident of this community over fifty years. He was one of the old veterans of the Third Alabama regiment, was wounded at Chancellorsville, shot through the lungs, and although he lived to be 74 years old he still suffered at times from the old wound. He was a useful citizen and a good, true man.

Tried to Run Line.

Bay Minette, Ala.—State Quarantine Officer A. J. Giddeons, who is stationed on the Perdido River on the line between Baldwin county and Escambia county, Florida, brought into Bay Minette Thursday morning two boys, Beck and Matthews, both of whom were working over the line in Escambia county. The boys decided they would cross the line, but found the bridge they approached guarded. They then went away, but afterwards, crossed at a point where the guard could not see them. Knowing the boys, he suspected that they might take such action and they were promptly captured. They were brought here to Dr. J. C. McLeod, who is acting for Dr. Mohr, of Mobile, in so far as this county on Perdido river is concerned. Dr. McLeod sent the boys back across the line. Whether they will be arrested for violation of the quarantine laws or not has not been made public. The reports here are that the several guards on the Perdido river are turning people back every day and night.

Foundry Plant to Be Rebuilt.

Anniston, Ala.—General Manager H. H. McCord, of the Western Steel Car and Foundry company, has received authority to rebuild the malleable cast iron foundry plant at this place and the work of rebuilding has begun. The company will expend $50,000 in rebuilding and equipping the foundry, and when completed will furnish more than 150 skilled men with work. These men will receive the highest wages on account of the skill that is required of them. The malleable foundry was burned several years ago and threw about 100 men out of employment, besides crippling to a considerable extent the working of the plant.

Shoots Ox On Bridge.

Selma, Ala.—Peter Morse, a negro, caused much excitement on the county bridge Thursday afternoon by shooting at another of his race.

A steamboat had just passed through the draw of the bridge and a great crowd was passing over at the time of the shooting. Four shots were fired, one of which struck the negro in the leg and the other hit an ox which was on the bridge, killing it. The dispute had arisen over the ownership of a guitar. Morse was captured shortly after the shooting.

Schooner Is Run Down.

Mobile, Ala.—Information has been received in this city to the effect that the steamer Mobile of the Munson line, plying between Mobile and Havana, had run down and sunk the schooner Vila y Hermono on her last trip to Havana. Captain Clark, of the schooner, with his family and crew were saved and carried to Havana. It is probable that the accident occurred near the Cuban coast, as the schooner cleared with a cargo of lumber for Havana and had had time to discharge her cargo and start on the return voyage.

Opening of School.

Scottsboro, Ala.—The opening of the Scottsboro Baptist institute on Thursday morning was an auspicious occasion. The large college hall was thronged with visitors, patrons and pupils. Addresses were made by Hon. C. W. Brown, of Glinyaida, and Judge J. A. Bilbro, of Gadsden. Over one hundred students were enrolled. A great many more will enter later. Professor Yarbrough, the newly-elected principal, is delighted with the prospects.

Cotton picking has begun in Jackson county, and hands are in great demand. The crop is very poor and will not make more than one-half the amount made last year.

Gadsden Schools Well Attended.

Gadsden, Ala.—Gadsden's free public school opened up its fall term last week with the largest attendance in its history on opening day. The number of students now enrolled is 650, which will be increased to at least 850 in another month. Prof. W. E. Striplin and his able corps of teachers and the pupils are already down at hard work, and great results are expected from this term.

N. H. Snodgrass Is Married.

Scottsboro, Ala.—N. H. Snodgrass, the wealthiest and one of the most prominent young planters in Jackson county, surprised his many friends when he arrived from Fort Payne by private conveyance Tuesday accompanied by his bride. He was married in Fort Payne recently to Miss Lidia Thomason of that city. Mr. and Mrs. Snodgrass will reside at his handsome country home near Scottsboro.

Lineman Burned by Wire.

Huntsville, Ala.—Lineman Edward Daugherty, of the Southern Bell Telephone Company, was probably fatally burned Friday by touching a live electric wire. Daugherty was suspended by a rope and his clothing blazed several minutes before help could reach him. Will Gray, a lineman, was killed on the same wire and same pole last April.

Attempted Assault.

Bessemer, Ala.—Considerable excitement was created Friday morning about 10 o'clock when it was reported that an unknown negro had attempted criminal assault upon the person of Mrs. M. G. Lowry, a white woman, living at Reader's Gap.

Local officials and a posse of indignant citizens hurried to the scene of the reported crime about one mile beyond Reader's Gap on the Little Shades road, but no trace of the negro could be secured. Dogs placed on the trail failed to follow it up.

Mrs. Lowry is a widow 64 years of age and has several sons and daughters living in and around Bessemer. She is very feeble and was greatly excited, so much so that she could give no definite description of the negro.

She came to town herself and reported the matter to Deputy Sheriff Jerry Fountain, stating that the negro had accosted her on the road, asking her about where he could find some chickens and then demanding where she was going. Becoming alarmed at the negro's manner she started to run and the negro pursued her, she claims, until she screamed, and then he turned and ran into the woods.

Ashland's Progress.

Ashland, Ala.—Work has begun on five new store buildings in Ashland, and the contract for a new bank building has been let.

The corn crop in this county is very good, but the cotton crop is somewhat short. It is not believed that the crop will be so good as last year's.

The A. and B. railroad, projected through this county, it is thought, will be built soon. As yet the exact location of the road is not known. The right-of-way through this county is guaranteed to the company by the citizens.

A Bank for Slocomb.

Witte Drinks to President's Health.

New York.—Col. George Harvey entertained at dinner Thursday night at the Metropolitan club the Russian peace envoys, M. Witte and Baron De-Rosen, the members of their suites and a company of men distinguished in the different walks of life.

M. Witte spoke first, saying he had insisted upon being accorded that privilege that he might have the honor to propose a toast "to the health of the illustrious statesman, Theodore Roosevelt."

M. Witte's last words were drowned with cheers. When these were ended he resumed speaking in French:

"At the same time it is my pleasure and I believe it my duty to propose a toast to the prosperity of the great and marvelous American people who are so admirably personified in the president. I drink to this glorious republic and its president, Mr. Roosevelt."

Colonel Harvey followed M. Witte and proposed a health toast to the Russian emperor, which was drunk standing.

Colonel Harvey referred to the friendly relations that have always existed between Russia and the United States.

In conclusion he offered a greeting "from the great white nation of the west to the great white nation of the east."

Baron De Rosen spoke next.

"Peace," he said, "was the passionate desire of Russia, but Russia wanted the peace that comes of right to the just man, armed, and not the peace given to the beaten craven."

Elihu Root, secretary of state, spoke briefly. He congratulated the envoys on the success of their mission. He referred to the courage which had enabled the representatives of both great nations to make peace, for he said it required "more courage to make peace than to make war."

GOVERNORS CALL

From Twelve of the Southern States on Immigration and Quarantine.

QUESTIONS TO BE DISCUSSED.

Will Take Up Matter of Uniform Regulations for the States—To Discuss Immigration Movement.

Chattancoga, Tenn.—The following is the call issued for the November meeting to be held in this city:

"In the development of the South vital questions are involved aside from these which tend solely to its material growth and progress. Its matchless climate, generous soil, riches in minerals, fields and forests; its beauty in hills, valleys, fruits and flowers; its wealth in fountains, streams and rivers are indeed priceless gifts from nature's treasury, yet they are only some of the factors that contribute to the advancement and welfare of a people.

"The possession of health, the cultivation of mind and morals, the establishment of right rather than might and the reign of truth and justice—these are the things more to be prized than all others for which mankind should strive, for these are the foundations on which the aegis of Christian civilization must ever rest.

"From time immemorial these are the standards by which the people of the South have sought to be measured, and there is no stronger obligation resting on its citizens today than to earnestly desire and honestly endeavor to uphold these standards for the benefit of the present and future generations.

"To the thoughtful observer of passing events this proud heritage is being menaced from two sources at this time, and it is to emphasize this fact and concentrate public sentiment thereon that this call for a southern immigration and quarantine conference is sent out.

"In the attempt that has been made by various cities, towns and communities in the south to protect themseles from the dread ravages of yellow fever, the most strenuous and at times the most unreasonable, unnecessary and burdensome measures have been adopted, measures that not only tend to cripple and destroy business and commerce, but which reflected on the very instincts of our common community, and became a reproach to civilization itself. It is evident, therefore, that some uniform system of quarantine should be adopted that will allay the apprehension of the people and minimize the dangers resulting from an outbreak of this disease. This is necessary if we would, save our land from the demoralizing and brutalizing tendencies of a panic-inspired quarantine.

"Again, there are coming into the United States at the present time larger numbers of foreign immigrants than ever before in our country's history. Among these are great masses who are wholly undesirable and whom it will be impossible to assimilate with our institutions. There is apparently a desire or tendency to bring many of these undesirable immigrants to southern ports, and also to distribute them from northern cities into the south.

"The south will welcome desirable immigrants from any and all lands, but it has already racial problems of such gravity that no others should be invited until proper safeguards are provided in advance of their coming.

"For the foregoing reasons, therefore, the undersigned, having only the interests and welfare of the south at heart, hereby issue this, our call for a southern conference on immigration and quarantine to be held in the city of Chattanooga, Tenn., on November 9 and 10, 1905, and we designate the following persons as those expected to compose and participate in this conference.

"Governors of the southern states, members of congress, commissioners of agriculture, mayors of cities; one representative from national, state, county or city boards of health; one representative from each railroad system, preferably the general immigration agent; the editor, publisher or proprietor of newspapers and not more than five representatives from each commercial organization in the south.

"All parties thus designated may consider themselves fully authorized under this call to aid in furthering its objects, and are requested to co-operate with us in making the same what it should be for the south.

"John I. Cox, governor of Tennessee; N. C. Blanchard, governor of Louisiana; Edwin Warfield, governor of Maryland; William M. O. Dawson, governor of West Virginia; A. J. Montague, governor of Virginia; N. B. Broward, governor of Florida; James K. Vardaman, governor of Mississippi; Joseph W. Folk, governor of Missouri; J. C. W. Beckham, governor of Kentucky; S. W. T. Lanham, governor of Texas; Joseph M. Terrell, governor of Georgia; Huntsville Chamber of Commerce, Frank J. Thompson, president; Alabama Commercial and Industrial Association, Charles P. Lane, president; Chattanooga Chamber of Commerce, Charles W. Olsen, president; Little Rock Board of Trade, George W. Rogers, president; Louisville Commercial Club, V. H. Enghord, president; New Orleans Progressive Union, Albert Godchaux, president; Mobile Commercial Club, J. P. Wilson, secretary; Jacksonville Board of Trade, C. E. Garner, president; Asheville Board of Trade, George S. Powell, president; Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, R. F. Maddox, president."

Accidentally Shoots His Son.

Crowley, La.—C. Lebert Benoit, a prominent farmer living near Morse, accidentally shot and killed his son, Andrew Benoit. The elder Benoit had been practicing target shooting with a revolver on the porch of his house and was ejecting the shells from the chambers of the weapon when it was exploded, the ball striking the younger Benoit near the heart.

Shoots and Kills City Marshal.

Marlin, Tex.—Holland Dillard shot and killed City Marshal M. Coleman, a confederate veteran of sixty, who has been marshal for seventeen years. Dillard was in a buggy and fired one barrel of a shotgun, the load producing instant death. No cause has been assigned.

Claims to Be Cotton Picker.

Huntsville, Ala.—H. S. Weld, an insurance man, has made a bet that he can pick 400 pounds of cotton in a day. The best negro cotton pickers in Madison county only pick 200 pounds a day, but Mr. Weld has put up $100 that he can double this pick twice that much. The result of the wager will be watched with interest.

Forger Commits Suicide.

Houston, Tex.—August Becker, aged 65 years and feeble in health, was arrested on a charge of forgery, it being alleged that he realized $13. He committed suicide in his cell by taking poison. Once before he had been convicted of forgery, and was sent to the penitentiary.

Two Killed in Fight.

Anadarko, O. T.—Two men were killed and a third dangerously wounded at Oakley, a small town near here. The wounded man is a one-armed man named Roane Gonzales. His story is that the two men, who were strangers, came to his home and asked for work. When told there was no work, they demanded food and shelter. A fight ensued in which pocket knives and a big bowie knife were used. One of the strangers was killed outright with a stab in the heart.

Found Dead Sitting Upright on a Cot.

Salt Lake City—A Chinese woman called the police to the building at 53 Plum alley, where on the third floor the officers found a dead Chinese sitting bolt upright on a cot, while in the same room another Chinese who appeared to be insane had kindled a fire on the floor, apparently in an attempt to destroy the building.

On a floor below the police found Eddie Merode, a young white man, in a dying condition from what the police believe to be opium poisoning. His money, watch and chain were missing.

Wants Universal Peace.

St. Petersburg.—Emperor Nicholas Monday again appeared before the world as a promoter of universal peace. No sooner is the Russo-Japanese war over and even before the peace treaty has been ratified, than his majesty issues invitations to a second peace conference at The Hague.

That the emperor has done so was learned from a source which leaves no shadow of doubt as to its authenticity.

Big Fire in Nome.

Seattle, Wash.—Sixty buildings were destroyed by fire at Nome, Alaska, on the night of September 3, causing a loss at close to $200,000. The city hall, a small building, was destroyed, but the records were saved. It is reported that the big stores of M. E. Atkinson and J. P. Parker were among those destroyed. No loss of life is reported.

Date Set for Poultry Show.

Huntsville, Ala.—The North Alabama Poultry and Pet Stock Association has selected December 5-8 as the dates for the annual poultry exhibition in this city, and it is expected that the show will be the best ever held by the association. The organization has succeeded in its purpose of arousing general interest in the breeding of fine poultry and there are more fine fowl in this section than ever before.

YELLOW FEVER NEWS.

The Latest Reports From the Infected District.

New Orleans, La.—The yellow fever report for the last twenty-four hours in this city is as follows: New cases, 34; total cases, 2,605; deaths, 6; total deaths, 341; new foci, 9; cases under treatment, 311; cases discharged, 1,953.

Country Cases.

The country situation is still a source of concern, because of the appearance of the infection in new localities, far removed from the original centers of infection. The diagnosis of yellow fever in Merrougse, Moorehouse parish, near the Arkansas border, has been confirmed, and Dr. A. J. Thomas has been placed in charged by the state board. The situation near Bayou Natchez, in Natchitochez parish, is bad, and the charge that there are more cases there than have been reported, makes it worse. Another new point of infection is Everett, in Vernon parish, near the Texas border. This has not yet been officially announced, though there is no doubt about it. The patient died and the body has been buried.

Other country reports:

Bayou Boeuf, two new cases.

Patterson, four new cases.

Tallulah, ten new cases; one death.

Bayou Natchez, three cases.

Kenner, nine new cases.

St. Rose, three new cases.

Terre Bonne parish, seventeen new cases; one death.

St. Bernard parish, three new cases.

Evergreen (Avoyelles parish), two cases.

Lake Providence, nine cases; two deaths.

Vicksburg.

Vicksburg, Miss.—Four new cases and one death from yellow fever were reported up to 6 p. m. The record to date is 37 cases and 5 deaths.

Natchez.

Natchez, Miss.—Two cases of yellow fever were reported here, both colored, in the neighborhood of original infection. Dr. Lavinder reports a case of fever on the government boat Beta at Kemp's Bend, La., the patient being a member of the deck crew. There are 300 levee laborers within a mile of the boat, but every precaution to prevent a spread of the fever has been taken.

Nothing New on Gulf Coast.

Jackson, Miss.—Surgeon Wasden, of the marine hospital service, reports that no new cases of yellow fever developed at any point on the gulf coast today, and only six patients are now under treatment. The entire week will be devoted to a campaign of fumigation. One new case is reported at Hamburg.

Snow in Cripple Creek.

Cripple Creek, Col.—Several inches of snow fell here Monday. The snowfall was preceded by a high wind that blew down several buildings, including a large ice house.

Jelks Favors Movement.

Montgomery, Ala.—Governor Jelks said he was in thorough accord with the details of the quarantine and immigration conference called at Chattanooga and would attend if he could get away. He approves the idea of discrimination in selecting immigrants, and recently wrote Governor Blanchard, of Louisiana, that he was in favor of a more comprehensive system of quarantine.

Tombigbee Valley Land Company.

The Making of Molly.

MOLLY DEVEREUX was pretty and she knew it. At fifteen she was tall and slender, carrying her head with a daintiness her schoolfellows envied, but could not copy, and distributing her favors with a charming grace of manner, the inheritance of a long line of refined ancestors.

Her face, though not her only fortune, was a good half of it, with its soft pink-and-white complexion, its glorious azure blue eyes, its frame of silky, golden hair. The only thing that marred the otherwise perfect face was the look of conscious superiority, almost of conceit, that Molly habitually wore. She was the only child of her parents, a pretty, spoiled darling, petted and worshiped from her cradle. She was Miss Devereux, of Laburnam Terrace, and Molly's blue eyes shone, and her crimson lips pursed themselves into lines of proud content as she thought of her position, her beauty, and all that went to make up the sum of her existence. The past had been bountiful—the present was cloudless—the future lay before her, an unopened book; what might it not hold for her—?

And yet:

"Alas! that spring should vanish with the rose!
That youth's sweet-scented manuscript should close!"

It was upon her nineteenth birthday that the shadow began to fall. Molly, who, all the summer, had been working hard with the pleasing result of coming out ahead of 200 girls at school, many of whom were older than herself, suddenly showed signs of drooping. The lovely blue eyes lost their lustrous look, the pristine glint of her golden hair faded, lines appeared round her pretty mouth.

Molly's mother looked frightened.

"Darling," she said, caressingly, "you are tired—you are feeling the hot weather——"

"I think I am, mother, dear," responded Molly, in a voice she strove hard to brighten. "I shall be all right when the cooler days come——"

The next moment she was lying in a huddled heap on the floor!

That was the beginning of many similar attacks. Molly's heart had given out under the heat and strain, and she lay, week after week, helpless and panting, in her little white bed, her head in a whirl, her lips babbling over childish things long since consigned to the past.

But there came a day when the wanderings ceased—a day when there was silence in the sick room, when, after rambling for weeks the voice was no more heard, and Molly lay still and quiet, a shadow of her former self, with two big, lack lustre eyes staring up at the white ceiling.

"Molly!" cried Mrs. Devereux. It was early morning, and she had slipped into the pretty room, as was her wont every day on rising.

The girl turned her head in the direction of the voice.

"Mother!" she said, wonderingly, "why have you come in the middle of the night? I am all right, darling——"

"It is morning, Molly!" answered Mrs. Devereux, stooping to kiss the pale cheek on the pillow. "Darling, the sun is shining——"

"Morning? The sun shining?" echoed Molly, springing up in bed, a dawning horror on her face. "Mother—mother, where are you? It is quite, quite dark! I can't see you——. Light the gas, let me look—mother—strike a match quickly; I can see nothing but dense blackness——"

Mrs. Devereux fell upon her knees by the bedside. With trembling hands she lighted a candle, held it to Molly's lovely blue eyes—they never flinched. Oh, heavens! was it true? Was Molly in utter darkness—blind?

Her cries brought the nurse and her husband—and they sent for the doctor.

Alas! naught was of any avail. The city specialist, telegraphed for, came and went, giving no ray of hope. It was a phase of the illness—the sight sometimes went in a single night—sometimes—but not often—no, thank God—not often——.

"I can do nothing," he said, pocketing his fee and wringing Mr. Devereux's hand as he stepped into the waiting carriage. "It is no use sending for me again, although, of course, I will come at any time if you want me. Miss Devereux's sight is gone. There is no hope—she will never see again."

Then he was driven away to catch the express back to town, and Molly was left to battle with her trouble, and to realize all that his verdict meant, both now and hereafter.

But never a word of protestation—of rebellion against her cruel fate—crossed Molly's pale lips. Day after day, week after week, she lay on her bed of darkness, with a smile for everyone; with a cheerful, encouraging word that hid an almost breaking heart—patient, uncomplaining.

"If she would only cry out once and get it over, it would be more natural, and such a relief," the distracted mother said to her husband in piteous tones. "It is so awful to think of Molly, our pretty, clever Molly, lying behind that impenetrable mask, all day—forever——"

"Cheer up, wife! Whatever is is best. We must try to believe that, or else how can we ever hope to teach it to Molly—to help her to bear it?"

Mrs. Devereux's lips quivered as she turned away.

"You are right, John—as you always are," she said, with sobbing breath. "We must help Molly, whatever it costs!"

* * * * * * *

As the spring wore into summer once more, and summer slipped into autumn, Molly's health distinctly improved; her heart grew stronger, the color came again into her pretty cheeks, and at the end of two years she was once more able to take her old place in the house. Deprived of one sense, the others that were left her grew keener. What she had once seen with her azure eyes, she saw with her slim, white fingers now; the lips that had curved with scornful pride wore a patient, tender look, as the blind girl grew in a beauty which was far lovelier than that she had possessed in the old days. And the good that crept into her character, and transformed it, shone in her face; strong, self-reliant, capable, utterly unselfish in her thoughts for others. When she reached her twentieth year, a more lovable, sweet-natured girl it would have been hard to find.

"Of course, no one will ever want to marry a blind girl!" she remarked, almost merrily, to her mother apropos of something that Mrs. Devereux had said on the subject. "Don't beat about the bush, mother, dear, in that half-frightened way, as though you were afraid of hurting my feelings. I am no coward—I am not afraid of facing whatever is in store for me."

"My brave Molly!" cried her mother, pressing the tall, slim figure to her heart. "My heroine!"

But time went to prove that Molly was wrong. Somebody did want a blind girl for a wife—at least he showed pretty plainly that he wanted a certain blind girl—and that girl was pretty Molly Devereux!

Young Jim Tremayne came down from the hospitals full of energy and ambition, to take a partnership with old Robeson, the practitioner who had attended Molly from babyhood. He was ugly—passing ugly—but strong, upright, tender-hearted and clever; and, from the moment his eyes rested on Molly, there was no other woman in the world for him. Just at first he pretended to be interested in her case, as a case, but afterward he let himself be interested in her as a woman—the one woman—and hardly a day passed but he found some excuse to visit her home, and Molly's mother began to hope that, after all, Molly's blindness might not have marred all her chances in life!

"I am ugly, of course," he said, the day he confessed all to Mrs. Devereux, and received her permission to woo Molly, "but Molly's eyes will never be marred by a sight of me—and I am glad she is blind!"

He said something of the same kind to Molly, whom he managed to track down in the old rose garden a few minutes later, wearing a soft white gown, emblem of the simple purity of her white soul.

For the past few days she had tried to avoid him; her heart having whispered to her, she knew. She had grown to look for his coming, to wait upon his opinions expressed in such well-chosen, decided words; she felt that he was a man whom she could honor and respect, and even—in her room at night she had confessed it to herself—love! But that he should be attracted by her—poor, blind Molly—had not occurred to her.

"You love me, blind as I am?" she stammered, the color flushing into her face as she stood in front of him in the pathway, putting out her hands a little uncertainly.

"I think I love you because you are blind!" he said, happily. She had not repulsed him, and that was a point in his favor.

"Ah!"—she drew a long breath—"you pity me——"

"Pity you! Nonsense!" he exclaimed, laughing, possessing himself of her two hands. "Molly, I am not handsome; put up your fingers and feel my face; but I love you very, very dearly, and I want you to be my wife, my dearest, most honored possession. Will you, darling? Just tell me you don't quite hate me, and I will teach you to love me, ugly as I am——"

But Molly was simple and straightforward; no idea of playing with him and keeping him in unnecessary suspense entered her pretty head.

"If you are sure—it isn't—pity!" she began, her cheeks flushing again, "for I could not bear to think that——"

He bent down and prevented her from saying more by kissing her again and again passionately upon the lips.

"Does this feel like pity?" he asked, tenderly. Then, unrepulsed, he folded her in his strong young arms. "Darling, my own darling Molly—please God, I will deserve you and make you happy always."

And they wandered awhile in the lovers' Elysium after that; earth only contained each other for those two, and they were content to believe it for the nonce!

* * * * * * *

"I shall never regret Molly's blindness again," Mrs. Devereux said to her husband, as together they stood and looked down on Molly sleeping peacefully, late that same night. "Don't you think it altered her for the better, John?" hesitatingly.

John Devereux stooped down and pressed his lips to his wife's worn cheek. "I think it has been the making of Molly!" was all he said. But she understood.—New York Weekly.

THE PRIMITIVE OBSERVATORY OF JEYPORE.

Jeypore is the pleasant, healthy capital of one of the most prosperous independent States of Rajputana, India, and is a very busy and important commercial town, with large banks and other trading establishments. It is a centre of native manufactures, especially those of many kinds of jewelry and of colored printed cloths and muslins. The enameled work done here is the best in India, and the cutting and setting of garnets and other stones found in the State is a large branch of industry. The crowded streets and bazars are most lively and picturesque. It is laid out in rectangular blocks, and is divided by cross streets into six equal portions. The main streets are 111 feet wide and are paved, and the city is lighted by gas. The Maharaja's palace occupies the centre of the city, which has a population of about 143,000.

In Jeypore is the famous Jantra or Observatory, the largest of the five built by the celebrated royal astronomer, Jey Sing, the founder of Jeypore, who succeeded the Rajas of Amber in 1693. Chosen by Muhammad Shah to reform the calendar, his astronomical observations were formulated in tables which corrected those of De la Hire. He built five observatories—at Delhi, Benares, Muttra, Ujjain and Jeypore. The observatory at Jeypore is the largest of the five.

It is not under cover, but is an open courtyard full of curious and fantastic instruments invented and designed by him. They have been allowed to go out of repair, and many of them are now quite useless, it being impossible even to guess what purpose they served in the wonderfully accurate calculations and observations of their inventor, but the dial, gnomons, quadrants, etc., still remain of great interest to astronomers, and the Observatory at Jeypore is one of the places which is always visited by tourists.—Scientific American.

Cure For Seasickness.

A home-coming passenger on one of the big steamships of the Atlantic ferry says: "The second day out I saw scores of people wearing a bandage over one eye as they walked up and down the deck. It struck me as being worthy of investigation, so I appealed to the surgeon. He informed me that the fleet physician had learned that seasickness is a nervous malady produced by seeing the motion of objects on board ship. The remedy is to bandage one eye, which has the effect of inconvenience of transportation has done much to prevent the more general use of the instrument. Even in the smaller sizes a megaphone is a particularly clumsy and conspicuous object, so that the idea of a Cleveland inventor of furnishing such devices in collapsible form has many meritorious features. He proposes manufacturing the trumpets from a blank of any flexible material having parallel side edges and an outwardly curved edge at the opposite end of such shape and curvature that when folded upon itself a cone of usual shape is produced. When not desired for use as a megaphone the sheet of flexible material may be rolled up into a small cylinder, resembling a music roll, that can readily be carried in the hand without attracting attention, or that can be stowed away in a suit case or grip. Of course there are eyelets and buttons or clasps at proper points to hold the trumpet in shape when in use as such.

The pleasantest Ellis Island report of the year is that of the 223 marriages which took place at the station in the six mounths ending June 30. CANADIAN HANDICRAFT

WORK OF WOMEN FOR VILLAGE INDUSTRIES IN THE DOMINION.

The Canadian Handicraft Guild an Important Philanthropy—Diverse Elements in Population—French Villages on the St. Lawrence Where Hand Looms Are Still Used—Doukhobor Embroiderers and Irish Lace Makers—Indian Artists.

The work of fostering Canadian arts and crafts is one of the most interesting developments of philanthropy in the Dominion. Canada is made up of more diverse elements than is generally suspected. The French influence is very strong among the Indians, as well as the descendants of the original Habitants, but there are also Russian Doukhobors, Gallicians, Irish, English, Scandinavian, Scotch and at least a dozen distinct Indian divisions. Each of these have had their native arts. The Europeans brought with them exquisite arts of lace making, spinning, weaving, embroidery, dyeing, etc. The native arts of basket-making, bead, and porcupine quill embroidering, plaiting and weaving have never been improved upon by any arts of civilization. Some of the weaving, in fact, it has been found impossible to produce by machinery.

Canadian rural life has grown prosaic to a marked degree within the past twenty years. There has been no great industrial development even in the cities, and the country communities have remained in many cases as primitive as when Evangeline twirled her distaff above the sands of Acadia. There are villages along the shores of the St. Lawrence where the French inhabitants are living the lives their forbears of two hundred years ago lived, with the important difference that while they go not to the outside world the outside world comes to them in the form of cheap factory-made utensils and fabrics. The people have not progressed farther than to have abandoned the handicrafts of their ancestors. Civilization is represented by the village store.

To these barren lives the arts and crafts movement made an immediate appeal. When, in the spring of 1900, the Montreal Branch of the Women's Art Association of Canada decided to hold an exhibition of handicraft in order to revive public interest in native arts, little difficulty was encountered in getting together a characteristic display. So eager was the response, both from workers and public that a depot for the sale of Canadian handicrafts was called for. It was not, however, until the spring of 1902 that the depot was formally opened. Within the last few months the work has been handed over to the Canadian Handicraft Guild, this step having been made necessary by the limitations of the original charter and the rapid development of cottage industries in all parts of the Dominion. The guild is composed almost entirely of women, although, after the British fashion, the governor-general and Countess Gray are named among the officers as "Patrons," Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal is "Hon. President," and Sir Melbourne Tait is "Hon. Vice-President." Several men's names appear also among the directors of the society, but in the main it is a woman's enterprise, developed and managed by women.

The native arts of the French Canadians consist of many ingenious weavings, among them the ceinture fleche, the gay sash familiar to winter visitors to Quebec and Montreal. This amazing piece of weaving is a heavy oblong of bright colored woollen threads, plaited by hand on a rude loom of sticks. The arrow, or lightning pattern, is the invariable design, and the threads form a handsome fringe on the ends of the sash. No machine loom has been invented which is able to weave a ceinture fleche. A modest one costs $25, and an especially fine specimen often brings $100. The wrinkled grandmothers, whose patient hands produce these ceintures, highly prized by tobogganers, snow-shoers, and other devotees of out-door sports, both for warmth and beauty, are nearly all half-breeds. The art was probably French in the beginning; the pattern is undoubtedly Indian. The arrow pattern appears in nearly all Indian decorations, basketry, pottery or bead work. If the crafts movement had done nothing more than to keep alive these wonderful old designs, mountain and river, lightning, fire, storm, forest prowlers, gods of imagination and fear, it would have justified itself.

The French-Canadian tapestries, coverlets, rugs, etc., show many charming designs, evidently worked out after the immigration. The pine tree pattern, the fleur-de-lis, full of reminiscence, the "Little Mary" pattern is teristic. The "Little Mary" pattern is amusing in its naivete and reminds one of the quaint little figures which our grandmothers worked on their samplers. It is a stiff figure of a girl or woman, with a slim, reed-like body and spreading skirts, very much conventionalized in many cases. It appears often on bed cover and quilt.

The "Little Mary" quilts are a sort of a tufted weaving, the tufts or loops pulled up separately through the fabric with the help of some small instrument, often nothing more than a bit of wood. It is said that practically the same work is done among the Acadians of Louisiana.

Besides the French-Canadians there are many Irish and English women who have traditions of Old World arts, especially lace making. At the crafts shop and in the exhibitions have been shown some remarkably good specimens of Irish crochet, Carrick macrosse and Limerick, and some beautiful Honiton. Inquiry has revealed skilled knitters of Irish lace in ... of villages, and the guild is ... every effort to bring the standard ... to that of the best Irish lace-... Persian coloring is in all of their work and their drawn work and open embroideries are as unlike Western work as possible.

The hardest arts of all to revive were those of the Indian tribes. Miss Phillips writes of them: "As a race there never was one more impracticable, more averse to combinations for his own good, or more deaf to the voice of instruction. But even in this branch of our work we have great cause to be exceedingly encouraged. We have aroused a pride of race in the Caughnawagas, Mississaugas, Micmacs, Montagnais, Crees, British Columbia tribes and others. The Caughnawagas, living within a few miles of Montreal and perhaps nearer a metropolis than any other of our tribes, had so attempted to modernize their work that it had become a horrible travesty on their ancient art. But within a year a change has taken place, and we are happy in feeling that the guild, through the government teachers in their village, has been able to induce them to use better materials, and do some of their old-time good beadwork. We now get from them electric light shades, belts, chains, and purses which show decided taste and skill in design and coloring."

Since the opening of the handicraft shop thirty-seven exhibitions have been given of work coming from all parts of Canada, from the shores of Labrador to the farthest coast of British Columbia. The first year the society paid the workers $900, the second year $3,000, and last year it was able to send them $4000. The Canadian government takes a warm interest in the movement, recognizing the fact that it is a work of national benefit.—New York Post.

Sable Island lies about eighty miles to the eastward of Nova Scotia and consists of an accumulation of loose sand, forming a pair of ridges united at the two ends and inclosing a shallow lake. Tracts of grass are to be met with in places as well as pools of fresh water. These afford sustenance for troops of wild horses or ponies, descended, it is supposed, from stock cast ashore from a Spanish wreck early in the sixteenth century.

The Washington Post relates that recently a letter was received at the Treasury Department addressed, "Uncle Sam, Washington, D. C." It reads, "Please find in close 05ct. For which I want you to tell me the side of the nickle is heads and what is tails. Use nickle for postage in return." The department replied that there was no "head or tail" officially, but an "obverse and a reverse side." The writer was told to toss a coin and take his choice, and the nickel was deposited in the treasury.

A Postal Card Race.

With a view to testing the time required by a postcard to go the round of the world, and to ascertain also the route which the card should take to accomplish its journey in the least possible number of hours, an interesting experiment in the form of a competition is being made in Paris. At 2 o'clock one afternoon at the Central postoffice, and in the presence of a number of witnesses, 470 postcards, sent by an equal number of competitors who had beforehand secured the services of correspondents in America and the Far East, were handed in after examination by and the certificate of a sheriff's officer. Some will go by the Havre route, others by Marseilles, by Cherbourg, by Southampton. After a few brief resting places, necessitated by the time taken by the correspondents in the United States or in Asia to repost them, the postcards will return to Paris, when the sender of the one that arrives first will receive a prize of money.—London Globe.

"How Miss Calhoun does scold ...," murmured Alicia to her neighbor, Sadie Gardiner.

Sadie curled her lip and answered: "How much Miss C. scolds us all—except you, Alicia," Miss C.'s never scolded with our work. Amiable enough! But she looks after the ... interests, and that's what they're ... Generally, in packing an orange, ... upper layer ought to be packed ... the crevice between two oranges ... a lower layer. Alicia was ... packer, and knew all the dodges ... ways of packing and grading, but the ... things sometimes puzzled poor Vina ... She sometimes made ... mistakes and had to repack a box. ... she had only packed two layers ... and sixteen when ... had two hundred and twenty-six. ... Such mistakes made no difference to the firm, because the packers were paid according to the number of boxes packed correctly, but they made much difference with Miss Calhoun's temper.

The forewoman looked at Alicia Harding with distant approval, which was Miss Calhoun's nearest approach to friendship, but Alicia was too sorry for Vina Biggs to feel pleased. Perhaps it was because Vina had looked so wistfully across the room when Miss Calhoun had said coldly: "That is right, Alicia." The girl wished Miss Calhoun would sometimes praise Vina, who tried so hard.

Now, after Miss Calhoun had scolded poor Vina, Alicia, ... pinning a little winter rosebud that she wore, made an excuse to cross the room, and put the rosebud in Vina's hand. The girl looked up, caught Alicia's smile, and gave a frightened, quivering little smile in return.

"Poor thing!" thought Alicia.

And that was the last day of Miss Calhoun's scolding of Vina Biggs, for the forewoman fell that evening and broke her leg.

Who would be forewoman now? It was the busy season, and the firm was at a loss to know whom to engage. Miss Calhoun, when appealed to, said: "Get Alicia Harding. She knows as much about orange-packing as I do."

So Alicia became forewoman of the third-story girls.

"You'll have a chance to reprove poor me!" exclaimed Sadie, in affected terror. "O Alicia, be merciful!" And Vina Biggs's usually frightened face glowed suddenly with new hope.

"I don't reckon Miss Alicia'll scold me," was her thought.

As days went on, Alicia found the place a very trying one. Some of the girls were offended by her decisions and her criticism of their work. But duty required her to be keen for the firm's interests. No slipshod work must be allowed. Often and often she thought what she would do if she were in Miss Calhoun's position. She began to feel annoyed if the girls carelessly dropped fruit; she was afraid some one of the firm might come and see. A good many things to which she had before been indifferent now assumed importance. Her days were very busy. She found herself getting irritable.

One day she spoke sharply to Vina Biggs about some mistake, and the girl looked up frightened. Alicia remembered guiltily that she had meant to be kind to her.

The new forewoman unfortunately spoke sharply to Vina on subsequent days, and the slow girl's eyes grew frightened again. It prompted Alicia to see that unconsciously accustomed look.

"You're growing like Miss Calhoun," Sadie privately informed Alicia.

"I can't help it!" answered Alicia with sharp nervousness. "You don't understand how it feels to be responsible. Things must go right."

That evening Alicia was once more to see how Miss Calhoun was getting along.

"I guess you find being f... isn't easy," said Miss Calhoun, "but there's one thing. Before I left made up my mind to discharge ... Biggs. She's too slow for ... And her mistakes! I used to tell ... The Humble Worker

BY MARY E. BAMFORD.

[illegible]pany with thirty-five or forty [illegible]s. Alicia Harding was wrap-[illegible]ers in rustling tissue-paper packing them for market. The [illegible]ked multitudes of great, smooth, oranges—navels and yellow St.
[illegible]ds and Maltese bloods and Mediterranean sweets.

Miss Calhoun, forewoman of the factory girls, was scolding, as usual, as Vina Biggs, who was slow and [illegible]rmarily dropped two oranges.
[illegible]discharge you some day, Vina
[illegible]," rose Miss Calhoun's angry voice. "I've a great mind to now!"

"How Miss Calhoun does scold [illegible]," murmured Alicia to her neighbor, Sadie Gardiner.

Sadie curled her lip and answered,
"I wish Miss C. scolds us all—except you, Alicia." Miss C.'s never satisfied with our work. Amiable creature! But she looks after the firm's interests and that's what they want."

Especially in packing, an orange in the layer ought to be placed [illegible]ce between two oranges in the lower layer. Alicia was a swift and sure and knew all the different [illegible]s of packing and grading; but these sometimes puzzled poor Vina [illegible]. She sometimes made mistakes and had to repack a box. Perhaps she had only packed two hundred and sixteen when she ought to have had two hundred and twenty-six.
Such mistakes made no difference to the firm, because the packers were paid according to the number of boxes packed correctly, but they made a great difference with Miss Calhoun's paper.

The forewoman looked at Alicia [illegible]ing with distant approval, which Miss Calhoun's nearest approach to friendship, but Alicia was too sorry for Vina Biggs to feel pleased. Perhaps it was because Vina had looked wistfully across the room when Miss Calhoun had said coldly, "That will do, Alicia." The girl wished Miss Calhoun would sometimes praise Vina, who tried so hard.

Now, after Miss Calhoun had scolded Vina, Alicia, busily unpinning a [illegible] winter rosebud that she wore, made an excuse to cross the room, and put the rosebud in Vina's hand. The child looked up, caught Alicia's smile, and gave a frightened, quivering little smile in return.

"Poor thing!" thought Alicia.

And that was the last day of Miss Calhoun's scolding of Vina Biggs, for the forewoman fell that evening and broke her leg.

Who would be forewoman now? It was the busy season, and the firm was at a loss to know whom to engage.
Miss Calhoun, when appealed to, said,
"Let Alicia Harding. She knows as much about orange-packing as I do."
So Alicia became forewoman of the factory girls.

"You'll have a chance to reprove me for me!" exclaimed Sadie, in affected terror. "O Alicia, be merciful!" And Vina Biggs's usually frightened face flushed suddenly with new hope.

"I don't reckon Miss Alicia'll scold much," was her thought.

The days went on, Alicia found the task a very trying one. Some of the girls were offended by her decisions and her criticism of their work. But she required her to be keen for the interests. No slipshod work was allowed. Often had she thought what she would do if she were in Miss Calhoun's position. She became annoyed if the girls carelessly dropped fruit; she was afraid some one of the firm might come in and see. A good many things to which she had formerly been indifferent now caused her annoyance. Her days were full. She found herself at times

[illegible] her mistakes! I used to tell her [illegible] discharge her, and I would. You'd better get rid of her, Alicia. Then one trouble will be out of your way."

Alicia hesitated. She would be almost glad to be rid of Vina. Yet Vina tried so pitifully hard to do well!
Alicia wondered if she really needed help much, and so she walked past Vina's house to see what kind of a home the girl had. And she found a very poor, dingy little home indeed.

As Vina saw Alicia coming in at the door terror swept over her. "She's come to say I can't work there any more. She'll tell me so right before sister, and mother always thinks I do well! And what'll we do without my wages?"

Vina had never told at home anything about Miss Calhoun's or Alicia's scoldings. It was only Alicia's former kindnesses that Vina had recalled, and tonight Mrs. Biggs beamed

There was no answer. "Vina!" cried Alicia. "Vina did the bricks hit you?"

Hushed by the terror in Alicia's voice, the girls in the room had all become still. Some red brick-dust and mortar had sifted through the crack under the door. Alice went down on her knees, but she could not see anything. She called Vina, but the voice on the other side of the door was silent.

"The bricks struck her!" whispered one girl to another.

"Maybe she had run down stairs," ventured another.

But there had been no time, and Vina would surely not have run against Alicia's orders, after bolting the door. They all knew that. If she were outside the door unhurt, she would answer.

The room began to fill with frightened whispers, and one excited girl burst into tears. "The poor little thing! Oh, the poor little thing! She's killed!" one girl sobbed. "And if she hadn't bolted the door we'd all have been right out there, running in the hall, and the chimney would have struck us! O girls, she's saved us all! Poor Vina!"

They heard men's feet rushing up the stairs, crunching the bricks. Somebody came springing over the bricks toward the door, pushed against it, muttered in astonishment, unbolted the door, thrust it open, and stood there, catching his breath. He was a member of the firm.

"Miss Harding," he cried to Alicia, "who bolted the door? Thank heaven, you girls weren't in the hall when that chimney fell! I—I was so afraid —"

But the girls were rushing past him, crying, "Vina! Vina!"

They found her under a great pile of bricks near the door, and brought the poor unconscious body in. The hands that had made so many mistakes at the orange-packing, and yet had worked so eagerly to earn something for her mother and the little ones, were limp and helpless now.

The ears that had heard so many sharp rebukes from the forewoman, and sometimes unkind remarks from other girls, were deaf now to all the girls' sobs and entreaties. The brown eyes that had so often held that frightened, wistful look were covered by shut lids that did not even quiver. There were bruises on the white face.

No one could tell how much Vina had been injured internally. There was no sign of consciousness.

She was taken away to her home. Alicia went, too, and saw the pitiful home-bringing and heard Vina's mother wail, "O Viney, darling, speak to me! Open your eyes and speak to me, darling! O my darling, best girl, are you gone?"

And Alicia's own tears fell as she told the mother that Vina had prevented the other girls from being hurt.

Poor Mrs. Biggs listened, sobbing. "I know Viney was glad to help," she wept. "O Viney, Viney, darling, are you gone?"

But Vina did not die. One night, a while after this, Alicia knelt beside the lounge where she lay.

"They'll all be your friends when you come back to work, Vina," Alicia was murmuring. "The girls all realize you saved them from getting hurt or killed. And don't you worry about money matters, Vina. The girls sent some money by me to your mother tonight, and they sent their love to you, dear. They're going to send some every week,—money and love both, I mean,—till you get well enough to work again."

Vina's weak hand stole out from under the coverlet and sought Alicia's. "I'm glad that I kept the girls away from the bricks," she whispered, faintly. "I—I like the girls. You tell them so, won't you? But—but I shut the door for you, Miss Alicia, because you wanted them to stay right there, and I—I love you. You were so good to me!"

Alicia clasped the work-hardened little hand closer; love was not too well known in her life. Who of the other girls, Alicia wondered, would have "loved her" enough to hurry to bolt the door and stop the terrified rush into the hall?

"Yes," said Mrs. Biggs, cheerfully, "I've been telling Viney the other girls will be glad to see her coming back when she gets well. You must miss Viney at the orange-packing. Viney's such a fine worker!"—Youth's Companion.

Wages of Sin.

Mayor Anderson of Jackson, Tenn., who has been mentioned favorably as West Tennessee's candidate for governor to succeed Governor John I. Cox, and to whose able administration Jackson owes much of its recent development, possesses a political record so clean and straight that he can well afford to crack a joke at the expense of politics, which he has a habit of doing every now and then, greatly to the delight of his hearers.

Last week a few merry and influential gentlemen assembled in the mayor's office. One of them was a prominent lawyer, another a supreme court judge, and a third an able politician.

The lawyer while telling of the rise and fall of a certain public man, used the expression, "the wages of sin."

"I have heard that phrase all my life," said the politician, "and I've yet to know just what are the wages of sin. Do you know, judge?"

"I give it up," answered the judge, "unless you want a technical definition."

"Tell us, Mr. Mayor," pleaded the politician, turning to Mayor Anderson "what are the wages of sin?"

"Humph," answered the mayor, "the wages of sin? Oh, they depend on what kind of office the sinner is elected to."—Memphis Commercial Appeal.

THE PULPIT.

AN ELOQUENT SUNDAY SERMON BY THE REV. DR. C. GEORGE CURRIE.

Subject: Growth.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—The Rev. C. George Currie, D. D., preached in Holy Trinity Church Sunday morning to the congregations of Holy Trinity and St. Ann's. Dr. Currie's subject was "Growth," and he selected for his text II. Corinthians, v:4: "Not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon." He said:

These words of the epistle express the important principle that wherever there is vitality life not only adds to itself continually, but at the same time never throws away, never entirely loses the essential elements that it has once succeeded in acquiring. That is to say, that all the time that life is putting on raiment, as it were, or being "clothed upon"—say, in the flowers, or bush or insect or man, for that part—all that time it keeps the essentials of whatsoever it has invested itself with. And it is never perfectly unclothed of its fundamental gains; "not unclothed but clothed upon." These principles hold good in relation to life of every kind and under all conditions. It is one of the great keys of nature that have been furnished to us, and its universality springs from the fact that the universe is fundamentally similar in all its parts. I mean to say that the universe is constituted in such a manner that the different plans of being, the physical, the intellectual, the moral, the spiritual, all correspond to one another. So that whatsoever is true in one is true in all of them. Mankind, in fact, has an instinct to that effect. Our ordinary words that we use in talking, for instance, for physical things are mostly the same as those used for intellectual or spiritual things. The word, "right" means straight, and "straight" is constantly used by us in a moral sense; the word "wrong" means twisted or corrupt, and "corrupt" often means dishonest. The things that are seen are, that is to say, divinely created pictures of the things that are not seen; and it is a great satisfaction that we can have a trustworthy picture of spiritual things that we can see. Our blessed Lord talked in parables, not because parables are simple, but because the truths expressed by parables (as the loaf of bread or the raiment or the water from the well, or the sparrow having his food prepared for him, or the lily getting its raiment without worrying about it) are not merely physical truths—you must not fall into that blunder—they are truths that reach all the way up through all the plans to the eternal kingdom. Our Lord talked in that way because He saw the whole of the plan, from the top to the bottom, and He talked in no other way to the people at large: "without a parable spake He not unto them." The plans, intellectual, moral and spiritual, are represented in the physical, and all of them are fundamentally alike. That is why He talked in parables.

Now come back to the general principle before us, "not unclothed, but clothed upon," and let us see to it that we have the physical and material idea distinctly in our heads. Here, for instance, is the stump of a tree with the different rings of wood of which it is composed. Year by year the tree has put on new growth, which you can see in the successive rings. But all the time that it has been putting on the new rings it has never completely let go of the old ones, and the first ring of all is right in the centre all the time. Let me give the little folk a simple illustration, that they may take it away with them. Children, you turn an apple on its side. Cut it down in the centre through and through. Then you have two halves, have you not? Well, cut off from either half a slice, very thin, the thinner you cut it the better. Then hold the slice up to the light. Now, what do you see? You see in the centre, distinctly, the dark outline of the original blossom that was on the apple tree in the springtime.

Now, take some examples of this principle. There is the Bible, for instance. It is a living book. I mean by that it was not flung down from the sky, like a meteorite, so as to land like Joseph Smith's Bible somewhere in a valley all made up and ready. It did not come that way; but it grew in the world like an oak or pine tree; and, according to what the Saviour says about the Holy Ghost continually teaching in the word in successive ages, the Bible, which is God's truth or the word of God, is, in a manner, still growing. Do you know that? It is coming out in parts. It is life from beginning to end. It unfolds, not a single period of man's history only, but successive stages in the growth of the human mind. Therefore it contains, like a tree, successive rings, as it were, greatly contrasted one with another, widely differing one from another. In one ring, so to speak, it is "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." Literally, exact justice. In another ring it is, "If a man strike thee on the one cheek turn to him the other also." In the one ring, vengeance; in the other, no vengeance. The Bible, as I said, thus unfolds to us successive ages in the spiritual growth of man. Some of its stages, or rings, such as polygamy, we have left behind us long ago; some we have not yet reached. The Sermon on the Mount especially stretches out and away to the future perfection of the race, when a nation like Russia will be an impossibility. At the present time, you know, all nations take brute animals for their representative coat of arms, because they all have the brute in them. The time will come when the bear and the lion and the bird of prey shall all be ground out of humanity, and the work be fulfilled when he that is struck on one cheek will turn the other also, and the race will become, as it never has become, Christian. And yet whatsoever has been true remains true forever.

While the Bible gives us the story of the Gospel, it continues to retain the law in the Book of Deuteronomy. Calvary does not blot out Sinai. They are related to one another. You must know the law before you can know the Gospel. You often hear of people being extremely willing to forgive. What is their forgiveness worth? It is not worth anything, because they have never suffered from the indignant wrath of a just and noble anger. No, forgiveness is not worth anything except where the anger restrained is the ring inside of it. Another thing, God continues to clothe mankind, as He did at the first. He clothes the human race with ideas. Where do you think the ideas come from? Did man produce them? They come from outside, my friends. Or, rather, from the God, who is within us, and inspires the whole. He clothes the human race with ideas. You open the wardrobe, as it were, and there, hanging up, so to speak, are Genesis and Judges and Jeremiah and Isaiah and the Gospels, the successive garments for man's successive mental purpose—the child's clothing, the boy's clothing, the young man's clothing, the matured clothing, the perfectness of the fulness of stature, as in the Beatitudes, here and there, in Epistles, in the Apocalypse, but above all in the deep mystical sense of the Bible all through—the true mystics, that we do not get from hearsay, that we know by intuition, but which, of course, to the mass of men are absolutely unknown and invisible. So far as the Bible is concerned the principle is true, "not unclothed, but clothed upon?"

You cannot make anything grow that has not roots. It is curious, but you cannot. Whatsoever it is sooner or later it will wither. In order to grow it has got to grow out of something. Ideas are precisely like plants. As I told you, all the plants of the universe are alike; growing things are all alike, whether ideas or anything else. It is of absolute necessity that they shall have roots. Thus, for example, love, joy, peace, gentleness, goodness, truth are ideas. Nobody can complain of them, but of what conceivable use would it be to stand on a pillar and call out to mankind, "Be loving, be joyous, be peaceful, be gentle and good and true," if you had nothing more to say to them than that? What conceivable purchase would those principles have in the world without the spiritual reasons out of which they grow and on which they depend, namely, the facts of living religion? The blunder of planting ideas without roots is as old as the hills. Every scholar, every student of history, is up to his knees, up to his chin, in withered sects, withered religions, withered kinks and notions of this and that sort, every one of which had a good side to it, but all of which have died for want of roots or continuous power—evolution. I do not like that word, but we will use it now.

Now, as opposed to both of these people, those who give the world no new truth and those who give the world nothing but new truth. The Christian church at large represents the latest truths, as well as the first truths, and the first as well as the last. There is no fault to find with these new doctrines. Of course not. On the contrary. For instance, the dynamic power—that capital and most useful thing, the dynamic power of the forces of nature—a prayerful desire for the healing of the sick. All right. The power of altruism, sacrificed for the healing of the sins of society. All right. My good friends, they are plucked straight from the branches of the tree of the gospel. There is no fault to find with these. On the contrary, it is for the sake of their production that we insist that they be taken in connection with the tree that has grown them—Jesus Christ and His sacrifice from which they sprang. Every institution springs from some root or other. There is the font at the door of the church. Well, it represents baptism, and somebody says it is a good thing to have a conventional symbol of purity or improvement. But do you suppose it would be there at all if it were only a conventional symbol of purity or improvement? Why, my friend, that font reaches down and down through all the strata of history; through the darkness of the Middle Ages, down to the first Christian centuries; down to Jewish rites; down to the ancient pagan and prophetic mysteries; all of which had their thought, or what answers to it, under the direction of Him who lighted, not merely Jews and Christians, but "every man that cometh into the world."

This baptism is a reality in the universe forever, because it lives by its roots. I might prove the same thing, if I had time, with regard to the cross or the altar, which goes down through the centuries, back to time and space before the foundation of the world. These, with other Christian doctrines, illustrate the Divine method, which is continual progress without any loss. In other words, as the apostle says, "not unclothed, but clothed upon." The principle is equally true of ourselves and our whole existence, for apparently there is never a real break in the progress of humanity. The Christian is never ripe, he is always ripening. Even in the moment of death he is still growing. Obscurely, but just as steadily as when he was a babe. When passing by death through the blessed gate like the new-born infant he is being "clothed upon" with new senses, new power and understanding, new ways of looking at things, so that having died, as we call it, he stretches out the arms and limbs of his being and is "clothed upon" like a tree in springtime. Life is worth living. Aye, indeed, it is. Don't you ever imagine for a minute that it is not. Life is worth living to a degree you have no conception of because the glory that is coming upon us, that is to be put upon us, may be measured, by the highest standard the world has ever seen, the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus Christ. Nothing is ever lost: it would be contrary to the laws of nature to suppose such a thing, but it is glorified to a degree that passes understanding to conceive: "Not unclothed, but clothed upon."

The Cross.

Was it not Tyndall who said he would go insane in an hour if he were not assured of the existence of a wise, over-ruling Power in the universe? How immeasurably more steadying is the assurance of the Christian that the cross of Christ reveals the mind of God! Life is inexplicable, if only power rules.

One of England's chapels is an architectural blur when one first enters it. But a verger soon tells the visitor to take his stand on a blood-red cross that is in the centre, and looking down this arm of the cross he sees a beautiful picture, and down that still another bit of harmony. The four arms point to wonderful representations of events in the life of the Son of Man. Only from that cross may the pictures be seen in their true perspective. Only a Christo-centric faith can see life as a plan and solve its enigmas.—Pacific Baptist.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR SEPTEMBER 24.

Review of the Lessons For the Third Quarter of the Year—Read Psa. xxxiv., 11-22—Golden Text, Psa. cxxi., 5—The Summaries.

Lesson I. Topic: God's protection of His people. Place: Jerusalem and the Assyrian camp. Hezekiah was King of Judah and Sennacherib of Assyria. At this time Assyria was a great and powerful country, and at the height of its power. It was a mighty nation of warriors. Nothing could stand before the Assyrian host. They swept over the country leaving desolation and death behind them. Their king sent abusive letters to Hezekiah to affright him. Hezekiah and the prophet Isaiah prayed and God destroyed their enemies.

II. Topic: Study of an Old Testament prayer. Place: Jerusalem. Great suffering and sickness came upon Hezekiah, King of Judah. The prophet Isaiah saw that death was the inevitable result of such sickness only as God interposed. Then it was that Hezekiah asked for added years, and received promise of fifteen years more.

III. Topic: The suffering, atoning Saviour. Place: Jerusalem, the prophet Isaiah's home. This is the deepest and loftiest of the Old Testament prophecies, and points clearly and definitely to the atonement. The life and mission of Christ is related in few words embracing humiliation, suffering, atonement and exaltation. The main thought is that the Servant is to be the instrument in establishing the true religion, by removing the burden of guilt and bringing many to righteousness.

IV. Topic: The gospel's gracious call. Place: Jerusalem. Regardless of the mean opinions of men and their lack of faith in the Saviour a magnificent kingdom was founded, and to it invitation and joyous welcome is extended. Jehovah's thoughts transcend those of man as much as the heaven is higher than the earth. The thoughts and ways of Jehovah are His purposes of redemption.

V. Topic: Chapters in a sinful life. Place: The kingdom of Judah, particularly the capital, Jerusalem. The faithful Hezekiah closed his life, leaving his son Manasseh to reign in Judah. By him the good work of reform was worse than undone; the people went into the lowest depths of wickedness. In his mature years Manasseh was made to feel the rod of affliction which led him to repentance. Then he sought to repair some of the evils.

VI. Topic: Vital factors in a successful life. Place: Jerusalem and Judah. Manasseh's effort to reform his kingdom did not produce much fruit. His son Amon disregarded this effort on the part of his father, and led people on in idolatry for two years, when he was slain by his servants in his own house. Then his youthful son Josiah came to the throne. He made earnest work of destroying idol worship and of repairing the house of the Lord.

VII. Topic: Purpose and mission of the Bible. Place: Jerusalem. With the neglect of the temple the people had been without the book of the law. In repairing the temple this book was found and brought before the king. He was greatly moved because of the fearful disobedience of the people, and the awful curse of God which was pronounced upon the very sins Judah had committed. He at once sought to know what the Lord would say unto them. The promise to him was that the curse should not come upon the people during his life.

VIII. Topic: Trying to destroy God's word. Place: Jerusalem. At the death of Josiah his son, Jehoahaz reigned three months in Judah. He was taken by Necho to Egypt, and his brother Jehoiakim was made king. He reigned eleven years and did evil in the sight of the Lord. In the fourth year of his reign he burned the Book of the Law. The Lord directed the prophet Jeremiah to write another. In this were more warnings to the people. The king was slain, his kingdom destroyed and his son carried in chains into Babylon.

IX. Topic: Persecution of the righteous. Place: Jerusalem. The kingdom of Judah was fast hastening to its end. The judgments of God were about to fall upon the people. Jeremiah, the prophet, was almost alone in standing for the right, and his life was in constant danger. His was a mission requiring courage, faith, strength, will.

X. Topic: Decline and fall of the kingdom. Place: Jerusalem. Zedekiah was the twentieth and last King of Judah. He took no warnings from the judgments of God which had fallen upon the people before his reign. He despised the warnings of the prophet Jeremiah, and mocked the messengers of God. Then the city was taken by the Babylonians. The house of God was burned, the wall about the city broken down, the palaces were burned and the vessels from the temple were carried to Babylon. The sons of Zedekiah were slain before his eyes, and then his own eyes were put out, and he was carried captive to Babylon.

XI. Topic: Vision of the glorious gospel. Place: Babylon. Ezekiel was among the captives carried to Babylon in the second siege against Jerusalem. But God gave him visions of the future and how He would bless His people. Ezekiel prophesied for twenty-two years. His prophecies were a great encouragement.

XII. Topic: The study of a godly young man. Place: Babylon. Here we learn of the beginning of the captivity of Judah. Babylon was at this time in the zenith of its power, ruling all Western Asia and extending its authority to the river of Egypt. Daniel was among the captives of the first siege against Jerusalem. He was then about twelve years old. He lived through the seventy years of captivity.

Veterans of the U. S. A.

Huntingdon, Tenn.—Companies 6 and 7, U. S. A., held a reunion here. The attendance was estimated at 2,000, which included veterans and their friends. The firing of a cannon proclaimed the fact that a big time might be expected. A barbecue dinner was served near the spring and Hon S. W. Hawkins and others made speeches. Many Confederate soldiers were also present.

A CARD.

Clanton, Ala., Sept. 18, 1905.

To the Republicans of Chilton County: I am glad to see that the Republicans of this county have gotten together and are all pulling the same way; and I am with you heart and soul in this effort to purify and upbuild our party in this county. The prospects of success are very good in our State, and there is not a bit of doubt but what our majority in Chilton in 1906 will be much larger than for several past elections, for many men who have the good of their county at heart have discarded their former prejudices and have joined the Republican party, the party of progress, the party that does things, the party of a free ballot and a fair count.

Your respectfully,

ALEX. G. DAKE.

REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

Pursuant to the following call,

TO THE REPUBLICAN VOTERS OF CHILTON COUNTY.

We, the undersigned members of the Republican County Executive Committee, recognize that there has been some differences in our party, and in order to harmonize all factions we ask ALL Republican voters of the county to meet in mass meeting at Thorsby, Ala., September 15, 1905, at 10 o'clock a. m. for the purpose of electing an Executive Committee that will represent THE ENTIRE Republican party of the county. Now, you may be busy on this date, but you can afford to lose one day to help harmonize our party. We hope to have a good crowd, and remember we will soon be confronted with another election.

Respectfully,

J. F. GOODGAME,
M. A. KILLGORE,
C. L. GLASSCOCK,
J. RICE,
W. H. GOODGAME,
J. M. WILSON,
E. J. JONES,
A. J. GLASSCOCK,
W. J. ATCHISON,
J. L. WILSON,
T. C. ABBOTT.

A convention was held at Thorsby on Sept. 15, 1905. The assemblage was called to order by M. A. Killgore, who read the call and asked the body to name temporary officers. W. R. Jackson and Wallace C. Edler were nominated and elected as chairman and secretary, respectively. Chairman Jackson took the chair and a motion was put and carried to make the temporary officers the permanent officers of the convention.

The following resolutions were passed unanimously:

Resolved, That no federal office holder can be a member of the Chilton County Republican Executive Committee, and that in case a member of the committee is appointed to a federal office, that appointment immediately vacates his place on the committee.

Whereas, death has removed from our party one of its oldest members, H. A. Wilson, therefore be it Resolved, That we, the Republicans of Chilton county, in mass convention assembled, hereby express our deep grief at the loss of our fellow member and respectfully tender our deep and heartfelt sympathy to his bereaved family in this, their great affliction.

Whereas, we recognize that THE UNION is the only paper in our county that represents and defends the interests of the people,

Therefore, be it resolved, That we, the Republicans of Chilton county in mass meeting assembled, do hereby endorse THE UNION as our organ, and recommend that ALL Republicans give it their hearty support and patronage.

Resolved, That we heartily endorse the present administration of our party, both state and national, and hereby pledge them our sincere support in all efforts looking to the upbuilding of our party.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that the executive committee of the county consist of 2 members from each Beat, and 5 members from the county at large, and a chairman and secretary. The County Executive Committee is hereby expressly authorized to fill any vacancies occurring in that body. All and any action of past conventions in this county that conflict with this resolution be and the same are hereby repealed.

The following persons were then elected on the committee: Beat 1, A. J. Glasscock and W. P. Cleckler; Beat 2, C. W. Reynolds and B. E. Collum; Beat 3, Y. O. Freeman and W. B. Cooper; Beat 4, J. F. Goodgame and W. J. Foshee; Beat 5, W. J. Culver and E. W. Clark; Beat 6, M. F. Lett and C. C. Burkhalter; Beat 7, Ralph Calloway and W. J. Atchison; Beat 8, W. M. Price and J. R. Short; Beat 9, W. J. Bean and B. N. Martin; Beat 10, J. N. Dennis and W. H. Gillespie; Beat 11, John S. Dennis and M. A. Killgore. At large, C. L. Glasscock J. M. Wilson, R. Vanderslice, Jasper N. Gentry and S. B. Ratliff, Sr. Chairman, W. R. Jackson; secretary, A. C. Smith. Short speeches were then made by a number present, notably A. C. Smith and W. L. McDowell, who signalized their conversion by giving a little of their experience. Col. Smith reviewed his past experience in the democratic party, and acknowledged that he had had to swallow many nauseating doses while with that party, but had made up his mind to break away from their ring rule and come over to the people's side. He made some scorching remarks about that party as it is composed and run, in this county especially, and was greeted with hearty applause at the close.

W. L. McDowell, in his remarks repudiated the democracy and said he was out of that party as long as he lived; that after their action of last year he had no further use for them.

The convention then adjourned.

W. R. JACKSON,
Chairman.

WALLACE C. EDLER,
Secretary.

THORSBY LETTER.

Mr. William Walker, of Maplesville, was in town last week. The Ladies' Aid Society of the Swedish Lutheran church met with Mrs. Nelson on last Thursday. The fast mail train No. 3 killed Mrs. Robinson's fine Jersey heifer last week. This is the second she recently lost in the same way. Mr. G. H. Gerald took a business trip to Birmingham last week. Miss Fanny Hawthorne arrived here from Eufaula on last Thursday. She visited with her parents until Wednesday and then went to Mobile to resume her work as a trained nurse. Miss Lucy Hawthorne, who visited her parents for one month, has returned to Tuscaloosa. There were quite a number of strangers in town last Friday to attend the republican rally. Miss Armstrong, of Birmingham, was a guest at the Thorsby Inn on Friday last. Mr. and Mrs. Collier have returned from Tennessee. Mr. Monroe Sorrell is here from Birmingham. Miss Alma Hovey entertained a number of her friends at her home on Monday afternoon in honor of her thirteenth birthday. They are busy ginning cotton at the new gin. They ginned their first bales last Saturday. Mrs. Robinson went to Birmingham on Wednesday for a few days' visit. Everybody come and see the baseball game which will be played Saturday on our home grounds.

CHATTERBOX.

MISS DORA THORSON ANSWERS ALMIGHTY'S CALL.

Thorsby has again separated from one of its young and highly esteemed ladies, the angel of death coming Friday evening, Sept. 15, 1905, taking away Miss Dora Thorson.

On August the 16th the deceased was taken sick with a slow fever which developed into typhoid fever within a short time. During the first few weeks of her illness there appeared to be no symptoms of danger, but just three weeks from the time she took sick she had a relapse and from then on, in spite of all possible care and attention, she daily grew worse. At 6 o'clock on Friday evening she was called to her heavenly home.

Miss Dora Thorson was born in Warsaw, Nebr., on April 1, 1884, making her in her twenty-first year at the time of her death. She came to Thorsby with her parents and brothers about ten years ago and was one of the first girls to come to the new colony. For the past months she filled the position as stenographer for her uncle, Mr. S. A. Thorson, who is employed in the real estate business in Calera. She arrived home on August 8th, intending to spend a month's vacation with her parents. Eight days after her return home she took sick and in twent-nine days responded to the roll call aboye.

In the death of Miss Dora Thorson Thorsby loses a lovely and highly respected girl, the broken-hearted parents lose an only and devoted daughter, and the brothers a kind and loving sister. The entire community mourns with the family and extends to them their sincere sympathy in this their saddest of sad hours.

The funeral services were held from the Swedish Lutheran church Saturday afternoon, when the last rites were performed by Rev. Hartelius and Rev. Helland. The funeral was largely attended by the relatives and friends who assembled to pay their last tribute of respect to one who was so much respected and loved. Many beautiful floral offerings adorned the casket and grave.

"A. H."

MAPLESVILLE ITEMS.

Mr. Ralph Calloway, who was painfully wounded by C. L. Branch, night watchman at the Twin Tree Lumber Co., with a 41 caliber Colt's pistol, is walking with the aid of a stick. Branch can not be found. The revenue men are making frequent visits to the country west of Maplesville. A large box still was destroyed in the possession of the Whatley family. Dr. C. N. Parnell's store is now an ornament to the town. Cotton is being rushed in. Farmers seem to be selling as fast as gathered.

Joe Damsky from Birmingham is in town for a few days in the interest of his business. Tom Perry, who took Joe Hicks' place at T. U. Crumpton's, seems to be at home behind the counter. Miss Bass, from Mississippi, paid her sister, Mrs. Davison, a visit. She was held at the detention camp on her way home last Saturday. T. U. Crumpton is building several new houses near this town. Mr. Lee Hays spends Mondays and Saturdays in this town serving papers.

A wreck on the Southern railroad delayed mails eight hours last Friday.

Success to the Union and the people's party.

"O."

LIBERTY HILL.

Protracted meeting began here last Saturday, and we hope for a good meeting. Mr. and Mrs. Blanton Riggins and little daughter, Ola, of Gate City, were here Saturday and Sunday on a visit to their many relatives and friends. Mr. Riggins is a brother of our former County Commissioner, R. C. Riggins. Judge L. H. Reynolds and wife were with us last Sunday evening, and we hope that they'll come again. I. E. Sarber has drilled a well for Liberty Hill that is one of the best I've ever seen. T. W. Atchley has removed from here to near Birmingham. We are sorry to lose him, but wish him much success. We have another young man here who wants some papers like Judge Reynolds can fill out.

"SOME ONE."

RANDOLPH.

Everything quiet. Several of our people attended the baptismal service at Macedonia Sunday. They reported the congregation immense. Twenty-three were baptized. Among the number were two old men, one a Confederate veteran. John F. Armstrong, out on the east side, has sold his farm to John Wallace, of Mulberry, and speaks of moving to Florida. Mrs. Brand was called to the bedside of her brother, Dr. Tom Sellers, at Brown's Station, Saturday evening. We learn he has since died. S. N. Waldrup came in recently and carried out a new parlor organ. Miss Roxie Collins has been visiting Miss Pearl Meroney. G. T. Duke a few weeks ago fell, striking the palm of his hand on a pine limb. It has recently caused him to suffer greatly, in addtion to making two or three trips to Selma for treatment. Glad he is now improving. Sam Edwards, of Thorsby, was in town Friday. The Mars Hill correspondent is of the right "grit." He says for farmers to "stick together." Yes, let the farmers use common sense and work together in schools, vote together, trade together—that is buy and sell together, and work for each other's interest in every legitimate way. The spirit of the Grange should always live among farmers. This is doubtless the way of success for the agriculturalist. Last, but not least, take the paper that works for you. Again, we say use common sense. We do not need so many big dinners and public gatherings (though they are good), but strict business methods, and that will win. The long winter evenings are coming on, the best time for reading. So let the readers of the Union supply themselves with good literature, and thereby make themselves stronger and better men and women. How much better to clothe the mind than to ornament the body with gold and pearls. Let religious professors obey I Peter 3:3-5; I Tim. 2:9-10. Let the young people seek knowledge, think deeply and soberly and clothe the mind richly, from the pages of Holy Writ, and spend leisure hours with good authors instead of in revelry and fun. Let us wake up. Abundant success to the Union.

"ONE OF THE BOYS."

PLEASANT GROVE.

Editor Union:

We'd a fine rain the past week, and now it is good weather for work. A good deal of sickness in our community yet, but we hope to see them all up soon. The series of meetings at Macedonia the past week closed on Sunday with a total of 28 added to the membership, one by restoration, 4 by letter and 23 by baptism. The meetings were conducted by Rev. G. W. Freeman, assisted by Rev. R. M. Honeycutt. Mr. Freeman is an energetic worker in the cause of Christ. Decatur has recently counted his children again, and reports 10 this time, of which 9 are living. The youngest is a boy. Bottle Stopper, of Center Hill, invites me to come up there and see their pretty little girls. Of course, I appreciate the invitation, and agree with him as to the many pretty little girls at Center Hill, for I attended an all-day singing there the fourth Sunday in May and enjoyed the day very much. Every crow thinks its young ones the whitest, and it is nature for us to be that way, so we must allow each other that privilege, but I do love to read of those pretty little girls I like the correspondence from Randolph very much. The writer had the pleasure of sitting under the sound of Hon. S. J. Bowie's voice on Saturday at Mulberry. He made an educational address and I would have been glad if every man in Chilton county could have been present. He spoke partly on local taxation. My dear people, let's look forward and work together for a plan to educate our children. It makes me feel sad when I think of the thousands on top of thousands of illiterate white people in Alabama who are natives of our state. The time has come when the illiterate man has a hard row to weed. I speak for one who feels the need of an education. I fear that in the near future the illiterate man's chance will be so slim that he can hardly pass. The one mill tax, if carried, will help some, but its very small. It had better be five mills. Let's hear from some one else on this subject. With best wishes to all, yours very truly,

JAMES FRANKLIN.

LOMAX.

Cotton picking is being pushed and if the weather keeps good the crop will soon be gathered. J. D. Windham, of Bay Minette, has been elected to teach our next school here. Homer Lowe, of Jemison, was at our singing Sunday, also several visitors from Cooper. W. M. Lodge, who has been superintending a coal job near Mobile, is back home. We attended the Republican convention at Thorsby Friday, and were rejoiced to see such deep interest taken by our people in that organization. Colonel A. C. Smith and others made addresses on the political issues of the day. Now, let us all put our shoulder to the wheel and push our party to the front in the state and the whole south, same as we have in this county. This is the party that has done and is still doing so much for us as a people. The party that has always brought us freedom and prosperity. If Republicanism is so good nationally, why should it not be good locally? Best wishes to THE UNION and the cause it represents.

OBSERVER.

CLANTON.

Mr. Editor:

Here I come again, and I am so full of joy I hardly know where to start. I wish the campaign was on now. I've got so much material that I can hardly hold back, but I must not waste my ammunition until the fight opens. Say, I feel like I'd jump a mile high (if it wasn't for having to light and the sudden stop might hurt me) after such a Republican meeting as was had at Thorsby last Friday. It's almost too good to write about such a harmonious meeting as we had. You know, we've always two factions in the county, but the people are tired of such a state of affairs, and they just sailed in and swept out the trash, and I'm glad of it. These bolting fellows haven't any following and I guess they won't try it any more. I think we've got one of the strongest Republican county committees I ever saw. By the way, we had some new converts from the democrats there. They said they just had to come, for they couldn't stand the democratic rottenness any longer. It looks like the democratic party (at least in this neck of the woods) is gone, world without end. I'm almost sorry for the dems sometimes, for I think they ought to have a good time here, as I fear they'll have such an unpleasant one hereafter. But don't they look hacked, like they didn't have courage enough to run a ticket next year. Look here, we may have to elect a representative this fall if the governor calls an extra session, but all we've have to do is to nominate a good man. By the way, I see the banner says the next representative ought to be a sound democrat; the banner man has kind of changed his tune since he run for the nomination in 1896, six years before he was naturalized: but then he didn't come tell you, our people have lots of sound common sense. You can't fool them much. And as to there being such a thing as a sound democrat in the present democratic ring, why the leaders would run him out in double quick time. Now, populists and republicans, let's stand shoulder to shoulder and put that clique out of business entirely, and let us be prepared to take care of those that want to come over, those that want to get out of the modern Sodom while there is yet time. We can't kill a fatted calf for each one that comes because there are more coming than we have calves, but we'll just take them by the hand and say "God bless you, brother." Well farmers, hold your cotton for at least 10 cents. I'm not afraid of hard times coming until the democrats get in power, and by that time we'll all be rich. Let's stand by our paper, THE UNION, as it has stood by us, and let's build up its circulation until it carries the sound doctrine into every household in our county. I believe our county officers are doing their duty. It does look sometimes as if Judge Reynolds thinks he is in the middle of a campaign from the way he is going about making speeches. Say, Judge, hold on; we'll turn you loose in good time. I heard some democrats say the other day that we had no material for candidates, but they needn't fret. Our big trouble is to get places for all our good men. Why, just look at the candidates we have left over from last year. Now Republicans, our troubles are over. We've good men for our chairman and secretary. W. R. Jackson and A. C. Smith are above reproach. We need not be uneasy any more, and we'll just wipe the demmies off the face of the earth next time. I am undecided now what office I'll ask for, for we are building up so fast that I may run for governor, or congress, or the senate. If we do have to elect a representative this fall, I'm going to touch up the ringsters a little.

JUST A VOTER.

LOCAL AND PERSONAL.

Mr. Elanton Riggins, wife and daughter, Miss Ola, were visitors to Clanton and Liberty on Saturday and Sunday, leaving for their home in Gate City Monday. Mr. Riggins expressed himself as much surprised at the way in which our county is building up since he was here about five years ago. He is a staunch Republican and was naturally delighted at finding so many of the same mind in Chilton. We all hope to have another visit from him soon, but he has important business interests at his home which keep him pretty well tied down.

Jim Wash Riggins was in Clanton Thursday.

J. S. Headley was in town Thursday.

J. C. Jones is selling many of those standard "Florence" wagons. Try one.

Edwin Billingsley, of Thorsby, is at Macon, Ga., where he is entered for a full course in bookkeeping, etc., at Stanley's business college.

J. W. Sharbutt was in Clanton Saturday.

Mrs. Ella Vinson, aged 68 years, of Falakto, mother of Mrs. Ben Wells, died Sept. 15 and was buried at Poplar Springs.

Write Stanley's Business College, Macon, Ga., at once for catalog. This school can not supply the demand for its graduates. tf Collector Hubbard was in Clanton Saturday and says that 11-acre cotton patch of his which promised so fine 5 or 6 weeks ago has shed squares and bolls so badly that he only looks for half a crop.

A. F. Mims and Harvey Wilson were pleasant visitors Saturday.

Elbert Bean was in Clanton Saturday.

Lyon, the photographer, is at his Gallery every day prepared to do the best work in the land. tf Uncle Levi Marcus was here last week visiting his daughter, Mrs. J. F. Goodgame, who is quite ill.

Judge Reynolds visited Concord church, just east of Clanton, Sunday and made the young folks a talk which was highly appreciated by all his hearers. The judge grows very enthusiastic over Concord, especially the Sunday school, and says it is run on the best system he ever saw and is going to try to introduce the plan in the Clanton Methodist S. S., of which the Judge is superintendent.

K. R. Burnett & Son were in town Saturday.

Revl A. C. Swindall filled his regular appointment Sunday at the First Baptist church of Clanton, preaching morning and evening to good congregations.

J. S. Scarborough was a pleasant visitor Monday.

Miss Lily Armstrong, of Birmingham, was a visitor to Judge Reynolds' family last week.

J. N. Dennis, F. A. Gulledge, S. J. Dawson and S. S. Scott were in Clanton Monday.

J. J. Grant, of Verbena, was a welcome visitor Monday.

J. M. Maddox was in Clanton Saturday. He says T. W. Atchley has moved to Kellerman. We all wish him good luck in his new house.

Frank Goodgame has a pig, mixed Berkshire and Poland China, which weighs 30 pounds and is only 7 weeks old. It is a sure thing that this pig can drink out of a jug.

I. E. Sarber, the well digger of Thorsby, was in Clanton Tuesday. He is drilling a well now for William Billingsley. Our people are beginning to appreciate having a full supply of pure water.

S. E. Headley was in town Tuesday.

Unity School opens October 9th with Prof. B. J. Sessions as principal.

J. W. G. Kicker was in Clanton Tuesday.

One hundred pupils are now attending the Clanton high school, several of whom are from other towns.

J. W. Sorrell went to Birmingham Wednesday to attend a meeting of the executive committee of the Farmers' Union, in which body he represents Chilton county.

James Norman, of Mt. Creek, had his preliminary examination before 'Squire A. G. Dake on Monday on the charge of assault with intent to rape, the complainant being Miss Belle Manning, of Verbena. Only the witnesses for the complainant were heard, none being called for the defense. 'Squire Dake held the defendant in $2,500 bond to await the grand jury. The bond has not been made yet. A number of prominent citizens of Verbena attended the examination which was held in the court house. The crowd in attendance resembled circuit court.

CHILTON COUNTY TEACHERS' INSTITUTE AT MULBERRY.

On Friday morning, September 16, at 10:30 the institute was called to order by Superintendent J. W. Moore. Devotional exercises were conducted by Professor Weaver. Prof. G. L. Speer, voicing the sentiment of the community, welcomed the teachers there. Superintendent Moore, as a representative of the teachers, responded to the welcome address. Next in order was enrollment of teachers. The following teachers were enrolled: C. J. Eiland, R. O. Headley, R. E. R. Hicks, J. W. Moore, John D. Norris, Miss Jessie McGee, J. M. Parrish, Miss Jonie Roebuck, Miss Etta Roper, W. B. Speer, G. L. Speer, Miss Gatie Sims, J. T. Williams, G. A. Weaver, Jerome Williams and Miss Zellie Mims, teachers who were on the program for the forenoon being absent, the work of the afternoon was entered into. Miss Jonie Roebuck read an excellent paper on "Value of School Entertainments." The subject was also discussed by others. A recess of two hours was given, during which time all were refreshed by a bounteous dinner and such cold drinks as were found bubbling up from beneath a beech near by. In the afternoon Professor Hicks gave an able discussion of "End to Be Accomplished by Teachers' Institutes." The question of discipline was discussed by Professors Hicks, Weaver Moore and others. Institute adjourned until Saturday. At 9:45 Saturday morning devotional exercises were conducted by J. T. Williams. Prof. W. B. Speer and Miss Etta Roper gave interesting and instructive talks on "How May Patrons Help Their Teacher." "Reqhisites to Successful Teaching" was skillfully discussed by one of much experience and close observation—Professor Weaver. The institute was honored by the presence of our beloved Hon. Sidney J. Bowie. For about one hour and thirty minutes he held the audience almost spellbound by a learned and eloquent address on local taxation and better schools. Adjourned for dinner. It was decided in the afternoon session that the next institute will meet Autained us so royally; be it resolved, Billingsley. The committee on resolutions made the following report: Whereas, the people of Isabella district have shown their kindness and hospitality to the teachers of Chilton county, met in an institute at Mulberry Church, have so cordially welcomed us to their homes and entertained us so royally; be it resolved first, that we, the teachers of this institute, extend to them our thanks and appreciation for their hospitality; second, that the thanks of this institute are due Hon. Sidney J. Bowie for his able and earnest address on the subject of local taxation; third, that Mr. Bowie has voiced the sentiment of this institute on this important subject. Fourth, that a copy of these resolutions be spread on the minutes of this institute. W. B. Speer, John D. Morris, Miss Gatie Sims, Committee. The institute was entertained for a few minutes by some humorous recitations given by Professor Weaver. A unanimous rising vote of thanks was given him for the recitations and his earnest work of the institute.

CLANTON CHAPTER NO. 116, R. A. M.

Sept. 16, 1905.

To the E. High Priest, King, Scribe and Companions of Clanton Chapter No. 116, R. A. M.:

We, your committee appointed to prepare and present resolutions of respect and condolence upon the death of our companion, Enoch A. Knight beg leave to report as follows: Companion Knight departed this life at his residence, near Clanton, on Saturday, the 29th day of July, 1905, and was buried with Masonic honors at New Salem Church, near Thorsby, on Sunday morning, July 30, 1905. This chapter was represented by six pallbearers selected from the membership of the chapter and by quite a number of other members. Be it resolved by this chapter, that our chapter has lost a faithful and respected member, one whose zeal for the institution was marked by his constant attendance on all convocation. Second, that the Methodist church, of which our companion was a consistent member, has lost an earnest worker and devout Christian, and that the State and county has lost a good and valued citizen, whose upright and loyal life is worthy of emulation. Third, that we tender to the bereaved family of our deceased companion our heartfelt sympathy, and point them for comfort to the Grand High Priest above, before whose will we must all humbly bow. Fourth, that a page upon our minute book be set apart and these resolutions inscribed thereon. Fifth, that a copy of these resolutions be prepared and presented to the family of our deceased companion and published in our county paper.

Respectfully submitted,
W. H. SARTOR,
H. T. PIPES,
J. W. STANFIELD.

DEATH OF VERNON PARKER.

On September 13 the death angel visited the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Parker and took from them their little daughter, Vernon. The sympathy of our people is with the bereaved parents. We know that we can't speak any consoling words that will lighten their grief or fill the aching void in their hearts, but would ask them to God, and does all things for the best. Strive to so live as to meet your child, who has gone above to await your coming. Don't despair. It will make you nobler in your striving to follow your babe to the realms of glory. Your loss is her gain. She has left this world of sin and sorrow, and is now basking in the eternal sunshine. So do not weep for her, but reconcile your minds to God's will and say, "May His will be done." R. A. P.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is hit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

Happiness

Happiness is not in wealth,
Not in greatness, not in fame;
Not in power, not in health,
Not in praise nor lack of blame;
Happiness is but to know
How to cherish, how to prize
That which is our own. The glow
That we always fancy lies
On the dear forbidden thing
Never was nor will be there;
For the slave and for the king
Joy is but to know or guess
That the treasures they possess
Seem to others rich and rare.
—S. E. Kiser.

THE EATING OF THE APPLE

BY PAUL BLAKE

(Copyright, 1905, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

Hand in hand they walked down to the edge of the great world into which he was going; walked through the clover and the daisies, across the little foot-bridge over the sparkling creek, through the old apple orchard, over the stile, down the dusty road, up the broad walk right to the two great iron rails which marked the omega of the old life and the alpha of the new. As they walked they talked earnestly. He was all enthusiasm, courage, purpose, eager to try the metal of his blade with the unknown contestants awaiting him out yonder. She was brave, patient, hopeful, hiding with womanly instinct her grief at the parting in order to further encourage and cheer him on.

They were but children—Calvin was 18 and Mattie 16—but all their lives had they been lovers and this was the first parting. Calvin was going out to carve a place for himself in the great world and to make a home to which Mattie was to come. Opportunities were too limited in the country and Calvin was going out to hurry matters. Ah, the plans they laid and the castles they builded during that last walk. Then came the whistle of the train, the last words of farewell, the last squeeze of the hands and the last look into each other's eyes—his flashing with anticipation, her's bravely keeping back the tears.

Ten years later a single figure walked down the same path to the edge of the great world, walked the same path through the clover and daisies, across the same foot bridge, over the same sparkling creek, through the same old apple orchard, over the same stile, down the same dusty road, up the same broad walk and right to the same iron rails. It was the figure of a woman and she walked with a defiant step and held her head rather too high. Her face showed traces of suffering, but her expression courted no sympathy. All the soft lines of the girl of sixteen were gone and all the sweetness and joy of a decade ago had fled.

It was the same girl who had walked to the edge of the world with the boy and she still was beautiful and attractive, but not soft and clinging. For the boy had never come back. All his vows had been forgotten. The great world had swallowed him. He had written for a time—at first nearly every day and letters breathing with love and loneliness. Then the letters came less often and took on a formal note. Then they came only occasionally and were perfunctory. Finally they ceased entirely. They all heard of him occasionally back at the home town. He was getting on in the world and seemed to be on the highway to a career. Several rather choice plums fell to him and the home folks talked about him not a little. They wondered out loud why he did not send for her or come for her. After a time they took to pitying her. This froze her bleeding heart. But the earth had lost its radiance and its sunshine; life had lost its joy. The narrow life of the neighborhood became intolerable and the pity of the good folks became as gall and wormwood. Then the old father died and she felt free to go away and bury her hurt heart, her wounded pride and her broken life in the great world. Where or how she cared not.

They were but children.

And so she had traveled the same old path along which she had swung so happily and hopefully and trustfully with him ten years before, to the edge of the world. Ah, but how bitter the thoughts, how different from those on that other walk. And the whistle of the locomotive sounded just as it did ten years before—and she, too, swung out into the great world to help feed its capacious maw, which demands ever and ever human hearts and hopes and ambitions and hates and fears and souls.

* * * * * *

Ten years after the woman walked alone to the edge of the world, a man sat listlessly at a table in a concert hall in the great city toying with the mug of untasted beer before him. He heard not the crash and bang of the cheap little orchestra and saw not the bedizened dancers on the tawdry stage, for his eyes were turned inward and his ears were ringing with words and sounds of other days. He was thinking—thinking of a bootless life, of failure, of disgrace of misspent hours and years, of forgotten obligations and broken vows. His face bore the evidences of dissipation and his clothing the marks of poverty—not biting, grinding poverty, but shabby, genteel poverty.

There were two white faces in Mlle. Madeline's room a moment later.

He thought of the hopes and ambitions and resolutions of his youth of his early successes and triumphs, of his first mad dip into the waters of forbidden and soul-destroying pleasure, of the gradual transfer of his allegiance from the stern and upright God of Duty and Ambition to the frail and seductive Goddess of Pleasure and Folly, of his slipping just a little here and there in the faithfulness of his work and the rigidity of his integrity, of the stopping of his upward climbing, of his long struggle to stand still and hold what he had attained, of his gradual slipping, slipping on the downward path, of his loss of position, his acquiring of another, his loss of that and ever and ever landing in poorer and poorer and yet poorer places until now here he was without work, without money, without friends, without reputation, his brain seared by dissipation and his hand unsteady to any task. Failure, failure was the word which glowed with electric brilliancy before his vision and from the shadows all about projected the horrid heads of the reptiles he had crushed out of sight all the years—Reproach, Self-accusation, Guilt, Remorse, Shame. With difficulty he stifled a cry of agony and brought himself back into the reality of the present. His eyes, again turned outward, rested on the stage.

A woman was singing in a cracked voice and dancing to the more or less lively bars of the music. She was painted and powdered and padded and her scant clothes were tawdry and cheap and not of the freshest or cleanest. And yet there was something about the woman which arrested the man's attention and filled him with the scent of apple blossoms and new-mown hay and green fields. He stared hard at her, then grabbed at the printed program which announced "Song and Dance by Mlle. Madeline." He laughed harshly and murmured to himself that he was "seeing things." But he stared hard again at the stage and just then the singer made her bow and ran off into the wing.

In her closing salute she made a little gesture which sent the blood back on the man's heart and brought him to his feet. "Mattie," he gasped and hurried, not knowing why, to the stage door, where he pushed by the protesting keeper and fiercely demanded to see Mlle. Madeline.

There were two white faces in Mlle. Madeline's little box of a room a moment later and later on there were confessions and self-reproaches and long stories of sin and suffering and misery—yes and tears and repentance, which must have made the angels glad. After all had been told, Calvin took Mattie's hand and said:

"We have both sinned and suffered and failed. It is my fault, but you have had to bear a part of the burden. Youth has gone, but the years yet stretch out before us. Father is dead and the old farm is mine, although it is mortgaged to the last limit the money-lenders will give. Let us go back and start over. No matter what people say. We will live it down together. We can never do it here in this accursed atmosphere of sin and sordidness."

* * * * * *

And so a few days later a man and a woman of middle age, poorly clad, wan, thin, white-faced, came over the line at the edge of the world and walked hand in hand back down the same board walk, back up the same dusty road, back over the same stile, back through the same apple orchard, back across the same little foot-bridge, over the same sparkling creek, back through the same clover and daisies, to the same old farm house they had walked away from so happily and hopefully two decades before. Their eyes did not shine with the hope and joy and courage of the other journey, but in the place of hope there was knowledge, in the place of joy there was content and in the place of courage there was resolve.

VALUE OF KEEN OBSERVATION.

"Scotty" Cites Billy the Kid as an Example of Shrewd Deduction.

"Scotty," the alleged Death Valley millionaire cowboy, was regaling a circle of friends the other night with anecdotes of the plains. Previously some one had spoken of the clever capture of two alleged sisters of charity who had been arrested for soliciting funds. Detectives who were watching the supposed sisters as they climbed the stairs of the elevated road say that they wore red stockings and high heeled shoes, and their arrest was made on the strength of that discovery.

"That reminds me of Billy the Kid, when he was floating around the Panhandle country," said "Scotty." "There was a reward out for his capture and a slick detective from the East thought to corral it. He located Billy all right at a ranch and rode up bold enough. Billy was suspicious of every stranger and kept a sharp eye on this chap, who let on that he was a granger looking for a site to cultivate. He was waiting his chance to find Billy alone and get the drop on him.

"Billy sort of edged around to the fellow and, suddenly whipping out his gun, ordered hands up. The detective threw up his hands all right and Billy took a squint at the palms.

"'You're a ——— of a granger with them hands,' says Billy. 'Why, they never done a day's plowin' in their life.'

"Billy's gun cracked just about then and the detective went to trail ghosts in some other sphere. Nothing like observation in this world. Here, give us another drink."

"Corkage" Not Now Needed.

There is one enduring tradition of the hotel business in the United States, and its outward symbol is the printed line on the country hotel bill "Corkage." At an earlier period, when wine drinking at meals was less common, it was the custom of hotel patrons to bring their own wines.

As every hotel keeper had, or was supposed to have, wine for sale at a profit, it was to the hotel keeper's interest to discourage the bringing of wine to table by guests, and therefore the practice originated of a charge for corkage, usually one dollar, which was in excess of the wine at the hotel.

The effect was to compel wine drinkers to buy from the hotel. In these days there is little reason why hotel patrons should "bring their own wines," and the fact is that few do so. Though the reason for the line "corkage" on hotel bills of fare is passed, the line itself has not.

Answering Abernethy.

Although one of the main characteristics of the famous Dr. Abernethy was the readiness with which he could administer a sharp and witty retort when occasion arose, he was once considerably nonplussed by the remark of a medical student.

"What would you do," the doctor asked the student at an examination, "if a man was placed in your hands with a broken leg?"

"Set it, sir," was the reply.

"Good, very good; you are a witty young man; and doubtless you can tell me what muscles of the body I would move if I were to kick you, as you deserve, for your impertinence?"

"You would put into motion," replied the student, not in the least abashed, "the flexors and extensors of my right arm, for I would forthwith knock you down."

When She Means Business.

"I have noticed," said the serious, offhand philosopher, "that a woman will get a golf dress when she has no intention of playing the game."

"That's so," admitted the man with the low forehead.

"And," continued the offhand philosopher, "she will get a ball gown when she cares nothing about dancing, and a tennis dress when she wouldn't play tennis for fear she would freckle, and a bathing suit when she has no idea of going into the water, and a riding habit when the very thought of mounting a horse gives her chills, and—"

"Yes," interrupted the man with the low forhead, "but when she gets a wedding dress she means business. Ever notice that?"

A Little Heaven.

A little white house on a little green hill,
With a little blue brook that babbles by,
And a little red earth to tend and till,
And a little gold glimpse of wheat or rye;
A little fond wife with eyes of brown,
And a little wee bairn with toes of pink;
A little kind kiss from lips that drown
Gloom in their dew—'twere to touch the brink
Of the azure ocean of love, and have One's soul in the splendors that lift and save!

—Portland Oregonian.

TRY TO MISLEAD DOCTORS.

Too Many Patients Refuse to Speak the Truth as to Their Ailments.

It was late, the doctor's patients had either passed away or were mending, and he was sitting with a number of his acquaintances in a corner of the clubroom.

"It's a strenuous life we lead," droned the man of medicine, "with the grim side turned uppermost as a rule, but now and then we get a laugh out of it—a laugh with the lid on, of course; we can't afford to show we're amused. I often wonder," he went on, genially, "why some of you chaps ever send for a physician. You don't tell him the truth once in twenty times. You're in a bad way and you're sorry, and to hear you talk I'd think your mouths were cold storage boxes for butter. You suspect that lobster or a rich sauce you ate the day before yesterday is at the bottom of the trouble. You know what's curled up in you and you're frightened out of a year's growth for fear I'll learn.

"Accordingly, instead of taking me into your confidence you tell me an impossible story. And if I cross-examine you closely and hedge you in you'll reluctantly admit that you've been somewhat indiscreet. You smoked four cigars Thursday and took six drinks. Doesn't it ever occur to you that I know by your flutters that you smoked from breakfast to bed and took sixteen drinks and six more for good measure?

"If I were to believe you and dose you for your ailment as you describe it you'd never get well. Now and then I have to give you strychnine and nitro-glycerine to restore the action of the heart and to listen to you I might conclude that you'd had too much pink ice at a children's party.

"As I hinted, we doctors get some fun out of you, but what do you do it for? We were not always doctors, we haven't always taken the best care of ourselves and we're not fools."

The Grafter.

James B. Dill, whose recent speech on "Graft" at Oberlin college impressed the general country, told recently, apropos of graft, a story about a swindling tramp.

"This tramp," said Mr. Dill, "had the alert, unscrupulous, bold mind that makes grafting successful.

"He was walking down a city street one day when he saw a little boy stoop and pick up something.

"He crossed over to the boy quickly.

"'You have made a find, my lad?' he said.

"'Yes, sir,' said the innocent boy, 'I have found a silver ring.'

"'I thought so,' said the tramp. 'It's the one I just dropped. Now ain't it lucky I had my name cut in it?'

"'What is your name?' said the boy, suspiciously.

"'Sterling, lad.'

"'Take it, then. It's yours,' said the boy, handing over the ring with a disappointed air."——San Antonio Express.

Harvard's President Appreciated.

Some years ago a physician was summoned in haste to attend a patient at N———. On arriving at the island, and inquiring for a conveyance to the house he wished to visit, he was directed to a farmhouse. Here the doctor found a man, whom he requested to harness a horse, at the same time, in the interest of his patient, desiring him to be lively.

The man pleasantly and promptly complied, harnessed the horse, and was speedily driving over the road at a good rate. The doctor discussed farming, and was struck with the general information and conversational powers of the driver. On arriving at the house half a dollar was tendered the man, but it was politely declined.

"What is the name of your intelligent farmer?" asked the doctor, after he had finished his professional visit.

"What, the gentleman who brought you to the house? That was President Eliot of Harvard."

His Favorite One.

There was never no one in the family disgraced either Sary or me,
An' we always lived happy an' cheerful as ever a family could be,
An' now when we think about Nelly the clouds all git over the sun,
An' the birds don't sing down in the medders, for she was my favorite one.

I watched her grow up from a baby, I've seen the dreams git in her eyes
In the days when the fairies would whisper to Nelly from up in the skies;
I've told her the stories o' childhood, an' told her that when we should part
The day that I seen she was missin' would break her poor daddy's old heart.

An' jist as I told her it's breakin'—I watch the old shadders pass by,
But the green o' the field an' the meadders blurs into the blue o' the sky;
An' sometimes at night I kin see her a-drivin' the cows to the bars,
But the moonlight is dim in the pasture, an' lost is the light o' the stars.

She's left us—there's Sary a-cryin'—jist rainin' the tears through a prayer;
I've wrote to the boys in the city, an'
there's oceans o' sorrow up there,
An' the pen kind o' stopped on the paper
a-knowin' the damage it done, Dishonor? Let God do the judgin', for she was my favorite one.

Poet and Fool.

This story of Alexis Piron, the French poet and epigrammatist, is told by the writer of "French Men of Letters."

Piron was unfortunate enough to be arrested one night by a watchman in the streets of Paris, and was taken the following morning before the lieutenant of police, who haughtily interrogated him concerning his business or profession.

"I am a poet," was the reply.

"Oh, ho! a poet, are you?" said the official. "I have a brother who is a poet."

"Then we are quits," rejoined Piron, "for I have a brother who is a fool."

Pranks Played by Neptun

An appearance of a new island in the Japanese seas calls to mind other rapid risings of land in the ocean. An island suddenly came to light off the coast of Sicily, remained two months and as quickly disappeared. Sabrina, near the Azores, retired from public life before it was fairly charted. The Gulf of Mexico has witnessed the advent and subsidence of small islands. These upheavals of the bed of the ocean suggest all sorts of mysteries connected with the unknown depths. An uncanny experience is related.

Our ship was out twenty-three days from Manila to the Sandwich Islands. It was a silent, dead-black night. The lead showed deep sea. Suddenly we felt as if we were grounded. The mate suggested a sunken wreck, but the skipper stuck to the theory of earthquake. Subsequent events showed he was right.

Daybreak revealed a low and misty sky. We lay as if becalmed in the midst of an oily sea, strangely discolored in patches. Suddenly the water trembled. I can use no other word. The ship rolled and in the distance rose a huge, balloon-shaped mass of vapor, steam or smoke. There was not the slightest sound, but a long line of chafing water stretched across the streaky calm. Then the vapor settled over all and we could hear, but not see, the seething and pouring waters all about us. The captain ordered a bucketful to be drawn up. It was hot and smelled like gas works.

"H'm!" remarked the old [illegible] as he sniffed it. "They're pointing to a new continent. I wish we were out of it."

The air grew more oppressive every moment. The vessel gave a great side roll and word was passed that we were aground. Over went the [illegible] and came up covered with blue, ooze mud. We were wallowing in slime, the darkness was pall-like and the atmosphere suffocatingly close. Then the air was rent with reports, awful to hear in that blackness. There were three of the deafening, roaring blasts and all was again still.

When the light came, red and unnatural, a strange sight met our eyes. It was as if the bottom of the Pacific was laid bare. We were helpless in a sea of thick mud. The sulphur fumes were choking and we had to take refuge below. Hour after hour we gasped, facing the probability of death by suffocation. Suddenly we felt that we were afloat. Whatever the bank of mud that held us it had disappeared, and after a time we made our way out of the grewsome spot.

When we reached Honolulu the crew deserted. "There's no luck in a ship that has seen the bottom of the sea," they said.—(Pall Mall Magazine.)

A South African Kingdom

King Lewanika of Barotseland, in South Africa, made a voyage to England a few years ago in the company of Col. Harding, the British government agent. He was much puzzled by the voyage. "How can we travel by night?" asked the king on one occasion. "There are no lights to steer by, and no land to keep in sight of." Again he asked: "What are those things above my head?" pointing to the life-belts in his cabin. When it was explained that the pople put these things on when shipwrecked and they wished to swim to land, he replied: "Where is the land to swim to?" The king got seasick. Col. Harding says: "Once when there was more tossing than usual I, too, felt queer and told the chief. He was delighted and said: 'Well, if you are ill on your own river, you can't laugh at me. On my river (meaning the Zambesi) you never feel headache, and your stomach does not move up and down, so I used you better than you use me.'"

In Barotesland Col. Harding one day delivered to a native chief a message which King Lewanika had talked into a phonograph. The chief gazed blankly, wildly, from side to side, looking this way and that, and finally, in spite of rheumatic difficulties, rose to his feet, and stumbling to the table, gazed long and hard down the mouth of the trumpet, with the evident lively hope of seeing there his master's head. Not finding it, he turned away dazed, and said: "How can iron speak? How can it know my language?" Then he added, with the air of one who has solved all difficulties: 'This is witchcraft.'"

Royal blood in Barotesland has to be accompanied by merit if it amounts to anything. Says Col. Harding: "To be a prince in Barotse in no way assures a high social standing until the same is won by some good work for the state, or by a high character for sobriety, or marked talent of some kind."

Colonel's Change of Heart

The following story is told of Col. Asa Barron, whom old-time patrons of the Crawford house will remember as the proprietor of this famous resort in the White mountains.

Henry Ward Beecher, while on one of his pleasure trips, found himself at the Crawford house one Sunday morning in July. The colonel, meeting his guest on the veranda, proposed a walk, to which Mr. Beecher agreed.

Col. Barron inquired if Mr. Beecher would not like to see his hogs, of which he was very proud. Mr. Beecher, who was very fond of livestock, said he would be delighted, and they turned aside toward the pens. As these were much higher than ordinary, Col. Barron called one of his men to drive out the hogs for his guest to see.

The driving commenced, and with many impatient grunts at this unwonted disturbance the drove was at last brought to view, except one old boar. Hearing his frantic rushes and protesting grunts, Col. Asa, who thought the world of his hogs, straddled the muddy entrance of the pen, and, stretching himself within as well as he could, cried, "Careful, Jim. Don't hurt him. Take your time with him. Don't hurt——"

But at this moment the boar, with a sudden turn, dashed for the entrance, and, rushing between the knees of the astonished colonel, upset him into the slimy entrance way, dressed, as was his custom in summer, in a suit of white flannel.

When at last he regained his feet, the colonel was a sight to behold. Jumping up and down in his wrath, he fairly yelled, his sentences punctuated with marks of emphasis of which he is said to have been a master. "Kill him!——' '——' '——' 'kill him!'"

When Mr. Beecher, finally regained control of himself, he remarked: "Well, colonel, it appears that the devils are still in the swine."—(Boston Herald.)

Deserted Streets in Cities

Deserted towns were common out west in the days of the land boomer, but deserted streets are seldom recorded in America, though they are fairly common abroad.

Many of these are the result of litigation, as in the case of a block of seven houses in Versailles, where a lawsuit over an estate has left the property without tenants for eleven years. So warm has been the dispute that the interested parties cannot even agree upon a caretaker, and the middle house, once occupied by the owner of the property, is filled with handsome furniture and effects which are slowly rotting because of lack of care.

Moscow has a row of seventeen handsome houses left without tenants because of two murders and a suicide within a few months. The notoriety given the case drove out the tenants and no others have been found willing to take chances on the ghostly perambulations of the [illegible]

Bromberg, in Posen, contains two streets of about thirty houses owned by a German who refuses to rent except to his own countrymen. His inability to secure other tenants than Poles has left the houses upon his hands for several years.

In Charlottenburg, Berlin, eight houses are untenanted because their owner objected to the noise made by the tenants, while twenty houses in Odessa have never had a tenant, their owner having run them up in such a hurry that the building [illegible] ordered and he was forced to flee to Constantinople.

Budapest's dead street is a row of twenty-three cottages, which no one will occupy. For some unexplained reason the death rate was four times the normal figure and no tenants can be found.

Eskimo Shows Much Skill

It is in Greenland that the hunting ability of the Eskimo reaches its highest development. He has a fine mechanical skill. Bones, ivory, stones, a little driftwood, skins and the sinew of the reindeer are the materials from which he must make his boat and weapons. There is nothing else. Says a Greenland traveler: "Of these the Eskimo builds a canoe, its frame of bones and driftwood, its covering of translucent sealskin sewn together with sinew. This kayak is decked over, except for a hole in the middle framed with a wooden ring. The Eskimo wriggles into this hole, his legs extended into the fore part of the boat.

"Round his waist there is a cylinder of sealskin, the lower edge of which draws over the wooden ring and is pulled tight with a thong, making all water-tight to the armpits. For heavy weather the cylinder is part of a skin shirt with a hood. Strings tighten this hood to the face and the cuffs to the wrists, while a pair of long-sleeved mitts protect the hands and arms.

"So rigged, a good man can turn his canoe bottom upwards and right himself again with sitting strokes of his paddle, for he is as waterproof as a duck. Moreover, his vessel is so flexible that it is almost safe from being crushed in the ice-drift, and, being limber, is extremely swift when propelled by the double-ended paddle.

"On the other hand, the vessel is so cranky that only about two-thirds of the native men have nerve and balance enough to hunt. Only three or four Danes in all Greenland have dared use a kayak."

Hens Find Money.

While some hens were scratching under the Caldwell & Brid Company's elevator at Baraboo, Wis., they unearthed a bill-book containing notes, drafts and certificates to the value of $1,000. The papers are the property of the Prairie Du Sac Bank, which was robbed about two years ago. The papers were evidently placed there by the robbers.

HONEST PHYSICIAN.
Works With Himself First.

It is a mistake to assume that physicians are always skeptical as to the curative properties of anything else than drugs.

Indeed, the best doctors are those who seek to heal with as little use of drugs as possible, and by the use of correct food and drink. A physician writes from Calif. to tell how he made a well man of himself with nature's remedy:

"Before I came from Europe, where I was born," he says, "it was my custom to take coffee with milk (cafe au lait) with my morning meal, a small cup (cafe noir) after my dinner and two or three additional small cups during the evening.

"In time nervous symptoms developed, with pains in the cardiac region, accompanied by great depression of spirits, despondency—in brief, dyspepsia. I at first tried medicines, but got no relief, and at last realized that my troubles were caused by coffee. Thereupon quit its use forthwith, and began using English Breakfast Tea.

"The tea seemed to help me at first, but in time the old distressing symptoms returned, and I quit it also, and began to use milk for my table beverage.

"This I was compelled, however, to abandon speedily, for while it relieved the nervousness somewhat, it brought on constipation. Then by happy inspiration I was led to try Postum Food Coffee. This was several months ago, and I still use it. I am no longer nervous, nor do I suffer from pains about the heart, while the coffee have left me and life is to me once more. I know that leaving coffee and using Postum healed me, and I make it a rule to advise my friends to use it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

FISHING OR AGRICULTURE?

Professor Wisdom was a learn-ed man,
A very learn-ed man was he;
Why, he'd read Arabic or Hindostan
As easy as our A, B, C.

One summer time he thought he'd take a rest;
From school books he would get away;
He'd take his collar off, also his vest,
And watch the farmers making hay.

And thus he chanced to meet a farmer boy,
One who was bright, yet had a way
Of asking some deep questions to annoy
The greatest thinkers of the day.

The Professor talked on the growth of yams,
And explained about the vulture,
But balked when that boy asked, "If digging clams
Was fishing or agriculture?"

Books in British Museums.

In the reading room of the British museum the desks are crowded with students all day long, and in addition to the books of reference some 20,000 in number, which fill the open shelves of the room from 3,000 to 4,000 volumes are given out every day. Theology in a wide sense, including the Bible, biblical literature, church history and works on the religious rites and ceremonies of all races and creeds, is easily at the head of the list, with about 300 volumes. Topography comes next, with about twenty fewer, and of these books on London amount to a quarter, books on English topography to another quarter, the other half being for the rest of the world. History and biography come next, English history being mostly in demand, and books on France and the French provinces second.

Essays, criticisms and miscellaneous literature take the fourth place, and are followed by fiction—not less than five years old—moral philosophy, poetry and the fine arts, the drama, law and philology, political economy and so on down to politics, mathematics and chemistry, which have about forty volumes apiece, and lastly works on naval and military subjects, which seldom have more than three or four volumes each. It is a curious list and throws a useful light on the sort of studies taken up by the readers in the museum.

Mule Finds Rich Lead Ore.

Half the lead that has been mined in the United States has come from the famous Coeur d'Alenes, the most productive lead mines in the world. Like many of the richest mines, they were discovered by pure luck. A man lent his mule to two prospectors. In the course of their wanderings the mule was tied to a tree, and he, becoming impatient, pawed the ground and uncovered a lead vein which is now the site of the famous Bunker Hill Sullivan mine.

The owner of the mule sued for a third interest in the claim and the courts granted it to him, stating that as the mule had made the discovery, and that, as he was its owner, he was entitled to the mule's share. The three owners sold their discovery for $500,000, and nothing was too good for that mule for the rest of his days. He was exhibited in a private car and lived on the fat of the land, and now a marble tombstone marks his grave. His harness hangs in a noted saloon, where it is gazed upon with deepest reverence for the old-time prospectors.

The mine is the richest silver lead mine in the world, yielding a net revenue of $1,500,000. Since their discovery in 1884 the Coeur d'Alene mines have produced nearly $200,000,000 in gold, silver and lead.

West Point's Oldest Graduate.

Gen. Herman Haupt, of Washington is the oldest living graduate of West Point Military Academy, and a man distinguished in civil war military history and in railway and engineering circles. General Haupt graduated from West Point in 1835, in the same class with General Meade. President Jackson appointed him a cadet when he was only 13 years old. He graduated when he was 18, and so probably can claim the additional distinction of having graduated younger than any other cadet.

Great Italian Actress.

Signora Duse, the great Italian actress, who has been appearing in London, has a wonderful power of facial expression. One moment she is apparently a girl of 16; at the next without any make-up she resembles an old woman of 60. She is an actress who feels her part intensely. She is reported to have said on one occasion: "If I played 'Camille' two night in succession, especially the death scene, I should die. I am sure I should die; the part is so real to me."

Ancient Counterpane.

Mrs. Lutie Whitlock, of Martin, Tenn., has in her possession an ancient and highly prized counterpane that her gradmother, Mrs. Lucy Freeman, made 116 years ago, when she was a young girl in Virginia. She carded the cotton, spun and wove the cloth, also carded and spun all the thread it is made of. It is an exceedingly handsome piece of work, containing some forty or fifty designs of the finest embroidery stitching, etc. It has been handed down and kept in perfect condition ever since it was made in 1789.

It will be interesting and an innovation if Major Higginson brings over the French composer, Vincent d'Indy, to conduct some of the Boston symphony concerts this season. The Boston orchestra has always been very conservative in the matter of star conductors, as for example in the Richard Strauss episode. D'Indy is a remarkable man, and his poetic ideas and original harmonies have stirred the musical world, though his music has no such world-wide vogue as that of Richard Strauss.

Counterfeit Relics.

An article in a recent number of the Birmingham (England) Mail states that a factory in that town is turning out weekly about 1,200 flint-lock muskets, and that a large number of this antiquated firearm is also made at Liege, Belgium. It is known in the trade that many of these newly made weapons fall into the hands of travelers, who regard them in the light of a "find," and a story is told of a Birmingham manufacturer having received a letter from a dealer asking him to procure some old flint-locks, for which the dealer had several customers, when the manufacturers wrote that he could not supply old muskets, but was prepared to make him any number of new ones required. These were, of course, given the appearance of age. The demand for old weapons is so great, especially in the American season, that the genuine articles would go but a little way to satisfy it.

Wonderful Change in a Night—In a Month Face Was Clear as Ever—Another Cure by Cuticura.

"I had eczema on the face for five months, during which time I was in the care of physicians. My face was so disfigured I could not go out, and it was going from bad to worse. A friend recommended Cuticura. The first night after I washed my face with Cuticura Soap and used Cuticura Ointment and Resolvent I changed wonderfully. From that day I was able to go out, and in a month the treatment had removed all scales and scabs, and my face was as clear as ever. (Signed) T. J. Soth, 317 Stagg Street, Brooklyn, N. Y."

WORKING WOMEN

Their Hard Struggle Made Easier—Interesting Statements by a Young Lady in Boston and One in Nashville, Tenn.

All women work; some in their homes, some in church, and some in the whirl of society. And in stores, mills and shops tens of thousands are on the never-ceasing treadmill, earning their daily bread.

All are subject to the same physical laws; all suffer alike from the same physical disturbance, and the nature of their duties, in many cases, quickly drifts them into the horrors of all kinds of female complaints, ovarian troubles, ulceration, falling and displacements of the womb, leucorrhœa, or perhaps irregularity or suppression of "monthly periods," causing backache, nervousness, irritability and lassitude.

Women who stand on their feet all day are more susceptible to these troubles than others.

They especially require an invigorating, sustaining medicine which will strengthen the female organism and enable them to bear easily the fatigues of the day, to sleep well at night, and to rise refreshed and cheerful.

How distressing to see a woman struggling to earn a livelihood or perform her household duties when her back and head are aching, she is so tired she can hardly drag about or stand up, and every movement causes pain, the origin of which is due to some derangement of the female organism.

Miss F. Orser of 14 Warrenton Street, Boston, tells women how to avoid such suffering; she writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I suffered misery for several years with irregular menstruation. My back ached; I had bearing down pains, and frequent headaches; I could not sleep and could hardly drag around. I consulted two physicians without relief, and as a last resort, I tried Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and to my surprise, every ache and pain left me. I gained ten pounds and am in perfect health."

Miss Pearl Ackers of 327 North Summer Street, Nashville, Tenn., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I suffered with painful periods, severe backache, bearing-down pains, pains across the abdomen; was very nervous and irritable, and my trouble grew worse every month.

"My physician failed to help me and I decided to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I soon found it was doing me good. All my pains and aches disappeared, and I no longer fear my monthly periods."

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the unfailing cure for all these troubles. It strengthens the proper muscles, and displacement with all its horrors will no more crush you.

Backache, dizziness, fainting, bearing down pains, disordered stomach, moodiness, dislike of friends and society—all symptoms of the one cause—will be quickly dispelled, and it will make you strong and well.

You can tell the story of your sufferings to a woman, and receive helpful advice free of cost. Address Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass.

BALLAD OF THE SEEKERS.

We would be free from every way,
From strain, from summit, and from test;
From seas [illegible] days,
From [illegible] that wastes the great unrest.
Then with a newly wakened zest
We'd seek by forest, hill, and vale,
With one desire in our breast—
Show us the yet untrodden trail!

When, as a bard, one ready plays
For a new theme, he from [illegible]
New rhymes, new rhythms and new lays
Be yet old highways at best [illegible]
Yon lurking flower, that now is neat,
The spring flush on the creek grown pale,
Are but old stories, [illegible]
Show us the yet untrodden trail!

Teach us the way to [illegible] days,
With clean, fresh [illegible] on us blest—
Won, not by dint of [illegible]
Or the world's tares [illegible]
But, when the young light [illegible] the West
And grim despair waits on the tale,
Then, when our hearts grow sore depressed,
Show us the [illegible] trail!

Prince, though [illegible] quest,
Though [illegible] is mast tall,
Yet shall [illegible]
Show us [illegible] trail!

FIGHTING A PRAIRIE FIRE

By Ernest McGaffey.

THE grass had grown in the Tarkio bottom until it reached John's waist as he rode through it on the buckskin pony. On the slopes it was thick and tall, and in the hollows between the hills it was crisp and high. As far as the eye could reach from the home farm it stretched away, a brown sea, and over it the broad-winged hawks circled.

Uncle Tom looked at it apprehensively.

"We'd better run a few furrows round the fences to-morrow," he said. "Fact, I ought to have it done before."

The fences were five ones, without barbs, and stretched on a line of posts set firmly in the soil. The nearest farm was Hardaway's, and the road in front of the farm, together with a field where Wes Hardaway had put in a crop of [illegible]sod-corn," or corn put in on the first "breaking" of the prairie, effectually protected everything to the east. To the south the grass was high, but the only thing a fire could do in that direction would be to burn the fence-posts.

To the west and north the Tarkio bottoms lay, and from the north, particularly, there was the greatest danger. For there the farm machinery had been placed under a straw-shed near the north fence, made of the straw from the August threshing, piled up and over a rude scaffolding of unbarked logs.

A little way from the straw-shed was the stable, a homemade structure thatched with a heavy coat of "slue grass," and with a number of poles lying on the grass to keep the roof from blowing away. In the stable were the mules and the ponies, and next to the stable was a large corn-crib and a modest little granary, where the oats, wheat and farm tools were kept.

If the straw-shed caught fire, with a north wind blowing, there was danger that everything except the house would go. This being several hundred yards to the south, and protected by a thick grove of young walnut-trees, was comparatively safe. But Uncle Tom had a premonition.

"Believe I'll just get some furrows along the north fence anyway," he said. To think with him was to act. He and John got the teams hitched and the plows out of the straw-shed, and together they sailed forth to the prairie. They ran along the line of the fences on the ingoing and to the north and then turned the plow a foot or so out [illegible] along beyond [illegible] other, at [illegible] a swath [illegible] the straw-shed [illegible] the [illegible]. To a boy Tom lifted the plow from [illegible] and he, the team, take a sliding [illegible] back to the shed.

The wind, which all day had been blowing steadily, shifted in an hour to the north, and after supper John, who had wandered down to the stable, saw, looking toward the river, a red splotch hanging low on the horizon. He did not pause an instant, but raced to the house, and throwing the door open quickly, shouted to his uncle, "Prairie's afire, Uncle Tom!"

His uncle, dashing down the county paper followed him swiftly toward the stable, and the first thing they did was to get the stock out and run it to the south side of the walnut grove.

They next got out all the lighter pieces of the farm machinery and put them in an open space round the pump at the house. The fire at this time was apparently coming leisurely along, but Uncle Tom knew well enough that there is nothing of the laggard about a prairie fire. He silently congratulated himself on having put the furrows down where the danger was most imminent, but looked anxiously to the west, where there was an opening through which the flames might come perilously near the straw-shed. He wondered to himself at having overlooked that corner.

Now the wind was freshening to a gale, and the fire, with a mighty roar, was coming with leaps and bounds. It was a wonderful sight. Ahead of it the white-hot ashes were projected in sheets, soft gray wraiths that fell on the dry grass as the agile flame sprang over, caught up the dead stalks in a wild uplifting of scarlet, and then bounded on again, whirling up the blazing grass in its flight.

When the grass was highest and thickest there were hollow reports, as of muffled artillery, and in front a steady and swift advance of gleaming and fantastic fire furies.

It fascinated John as he watched it. Uncle Tom had fought many a fire, and with a broad paddle in his hands, he waited until the cohorts of flame had reached the edge of the farm at the west before he decided on action.

"Wind's veering away to the west, John!" he cried. "The fire'll come up slow to these furrows in front of the shed. We've got our fight at this little corner to the west here." There was some grass along the fence, and if the fire came up with a rush along the strip pointed out by Uncle Tom, there was danger that a tongue of flame might lick in far enough to carry fire to the straw. Once that caught, there was no hope for the machinery, and probably none for the stable and the rest of the outbuildings.

Together the man and boy ran along the fence, intending to meet the blaze as it came up from the west and beat it down as much as possible, so that the advance of the fire toward the fence-line and the connecting line of grass toward the straw-shed would be broken.

"We're going to get singed a little, son," said his uncle, grimly.

John said, "All right Uncle Tom," but he shivered a trifle as he saw the hungry fire come roaring down the slope. The furrows stretched out far enough to the west so that the fight was in a space hardly fifteen feet wide.

It seemed as if the fury of the fire had weakened for lack of material as it swept up this lane, and John, with his mouth shut, as his uncle had cautioned, found that fighting a priarie fire was not so terrible a thing, after all. At least it seemed so at the first few strokes of the paddle. But the sparks flowed ahead of him and left him with scorched boots, while the flame crept up the line of fence like a live thing, and the two sprang after it and beat it down as you would a crawling serpent.

It was all over in fifteen or twenty minutes. The fire to the north, unaided by the wind, had run to the furrows, had mumbled and gnawed at the grass covered by the dirt of the furrows, lighted a candle of some tall blade, flickered, and then gone out. The sparks from the west gleamed menacingly here and there, and great care was needed to watch the straw-shed, but the real peril was past.

"You did well, John," was his uncle's comment, and the boy felt a glow of pride at the praise. Together they watched the steady roll and sweep of the fire as it galloped in from the Tarkio bottom.

"West fences all gone," said Uncle Tom. "My fault, though. I ought to have plowed in there a week ago. Maybe the furrows wouldn't have kept her back, though," he added, "and I was afraid to set it going myself."

Toward the Tarkio the skies were crimson. From the west, charging up the slopes against the line of wire fences, were sheets of fire that flung before them white ashen banners and roared their defiance as they came.

Together they waited until the last vestige of danger was gone. Then they went slowly back to the house.

As John took off his boots the soles fell on the floor. He felt a sudden sting.

"Gee, Uncle Tom," he said, "my feet are blistered!"—Youth's Companion.

Sleep in the Antarctic.

We complain of the difficulty of obtaining refreshing sleep during the heat waves in London. But the men with the Discovery found that in the low temperatures sleep was practically impossible. Describing the men's experience on the sledge journeys, Dr. Edward Wilson says: "One's very flannel shirt, with nothing but a vest between it and the skin, is full of hoar frost, the result of frozen perspiration, and all one's clothes outside of it are the same. All the accumulated wetness that begins to thaw wherever one's body comes in contact with the sleeping bag interior. After it has set in properly one begins to dream, and but for dreams, the most absurd under the sun, one would not believe that one had slept at all. Every hour or so one wakes to shiver, and then again the dreams begin, and this goes on until at last there is light enough in the tent to cook by, and one knows that purgatory is over."—St. James' Gazette.

Dumb Children's Cheers.

The gayety of deaf and dumb children finds expression, not in hand clapping alone, but in noisy cheers. The young inmates of the Royal Deaf and Dumb Institute at Derby held a carnival, the occasion being the formal opening of a new recreation ground. They had races and other sports, and the cheering at the success of a favorite was almost as noisy as that of children favored with full vocal powers. The new system of education of the dumb enables them to make intelligible sounds.—Westminster Budget.

Singular Death of a Sailor.

John Lucas, a sailor on L. H. Tillinghast's steam yacht Aida, which is lying off the Rhode Island Yacht Club house at Pawtucket, picked up a small brass cannon to-day and carried it along the deck. The lanyard caught on the casing, the cannon went off and Lucas was shot overboard. A boat was lowered and he was picked up, but it was found that the charge had torn a hole in his right side, the gaddling perforating his lungs. He lived only a few minutes.—Providence Telegram.

BURNED ALIVE IN FLAMES

Retreat of Victims at Avon, Conn., Cut Off by Fire.

BLAZE FOLLOWED EXPLOSION

Automatic Sprinklers Prevented From Working by Burning of Belting—Vain Efforts to Rescue Bodies—One of the Walls Falls Crushing a Number of Helpless Victims

Avon, Conn.—The explosion of a fuse, followed by a fire in a building of the Climax Fuse Company here, caused a panic among twenty employes in the building and resulted in the death of seven and injuries to twelve others. There was no way of coping with the flames, which spread with such rapidity that the escape of the victims was cut off. In all four buildings were destroyed, the loss being estimated at $100,000. There were sixty employes in the plant.

The dead are: William Burke, forty years old, married; James Joyce, about thirty-five, married; Robert McCarthy, aged eighteen; James Wallace, whose wife lives in Springfield, Mass.; Molly McCarthy, Miss J. Sullivan and Mrs. M. B. Tucker.

The exact cause of the accident is not known, but the accepted theory here is that in an effort to burn out a stoppage in one of the machines James Joyce caused an explosion of a fuse with the hot iron he held in his hand. Those who were in the room and who came out of the place in a condition to tell about it say that the explosion was not a severe one, and ordinarily would not have caused a panic. Inflammable material near, however, was set on fire, and in a few moments the room was a mass of flames. There was a mad rush for the doors and windows, and during the scramble many were pushed back into the buildings, while others were severely burned.

As one of the walls of the second largest building fell several bodies could be seen entangled in the mass of machinery in the basement, and in a short time they were reduced to ashes. The body of a woman was seen near the edge of the fire, but the great heat frustrated all attempts to rescue it.

A few rods from the group of burned buildings are two small sheds in which fuses and powder are stored, but they escaped the flames.

It was supposed that the burned buildings were either fireproof or equipped with automatic fire sprinklers, but on account of the burning of the belting which works the pumps, the sprinklers were rendered useless. There is no fire department in the town.

Superintendent Hagsell expressed the opinion that the great mass of flame which was seen immediately after the explosion was caused by the burning of the reels on which the fuses are wound.

"There was no powder in the room when the fire broke out," he said, "and I attribute the loss of life principally to suffocation caused by the smoke and flames which filled the room almost instantly."

MAYOR OF BOSTON DIES.

Patrick A. Collins Passes Away at Hot Springs, Va.

Boston, Mass.—The death of Mayor Patrick A. Collins, at Hot Springs, Va., from acute gastritis, was announced here.

The Mayor left here about a week ago for Hot Springs for a rest, accompanied by his eldest son, Paul Collins, and then was apparently in good health.

Mayor Collins was born in Fermoy, Ireland, March 12, 1844, and was brought to the United States at the age of four. When he was twelve he went to work, devoting his evenings to the study of law. He was graduated from the Harvard Law School in 1871. He was in the State Legislature from 1876 to 1871. He was in Congress from 1883 to 1889. In 1893 he was appointed Consul-General at London, England, where he served four years. He was elected Mayor in 1902. He was Chairman of the National Democratic Convention of 1888.

For many years Mayor Collins devoted much time to the cause of home rule for Ireland. He was the first National President of the Irish Land League in this country.

STATE AUDITOR PRISONER

Indiana Governor Finds Deficit of 1$45,000 in His Accounts.

David E. Sherrick Arrested After Long Controversy—Removal First Demanded.

Indianapolis, Ind.—David E. Sherrick, twice elected Auditor of the State, was arrested after being summarily superseded in office on the Governor's order for "betrayal of public trust," and Warren Bigler, of Wabash, accepted an appointment as his successor. The removal followed a long correspondence, in which Sherrick admitted that he was unable to settle his account with the Treasurer of State, and virtually confessed that he had been continuously violating the law by loaning money belonging to the State for his personal profit.

In a formal statement the Governor says he has been investigating the conditions in the Auditor's office since the last of August, having received information that Sherrick had not made the July settlement for the State's funds, which had accumulated from January 1 to July 1, 1905. He immediately asked for a settlement, which was made.

This amount was about $235,000. In addition to this the Auditor in his statement to the Governor admitted that he was at that time chargeable wih State funds paid in since the July settlement, amounting to $145,197.80, for which he filed a schedule enumerating the assets he had with which to meet the amount. These items included notes, stocks and securities amounting to $152,883.33, of which, according to the Governor's letter, only $87,355.01 could be realized on.

At the time that his analysis of the assets submitted by Sherrick was made the Governor formally requested Sherrick to resign. The resignation was not forthcoming. The Governor requested that Sherrick turn over to John F. Reed, the settlement clerk in the Auditor's office, the securities enumerated, and this was done. The Governor also demanded that settlement to the extent of $145,197.80 be made with the State, and again requested Sherrick to resign. At noon the request had not been complied with, and it was repeated. The Governor entered an executive order finding the existence of a vacancy and appointing Bigler.

Later Sherrick sent his resignation to Governor Hanly, who accepted it and entered an order appointing Warren Bigler, of Wabash, to the office of State Auditor. Bigler accepted.

The estimate of the deficit in Sherrick's accounts was made by the Governor on the assumption that $51,000 loaned to J. H. Murry & Co., and indorsed by W. S. Wickard, had been secured on forged and worthless paper. Mr. Wickard declares they are genuine and perfectly good. W. S. Wickard is a son-in-law of Murry, and, as the financial agent of the lumber firm, signs all its commercial paper. He declares that he went to the State House with a certified check to take up the notes, but found that Sherrick had been removed from office. He asserts that he will file suit against the Governor for libel.

Sherrick's bond on file in the Secretary of State's office is for $100,000, and was furnished by the American Surety Company. The bond for his second term was made December 6, 1904, and filed January 12, 1905. It is signed by Sherrick, the American Surety Company, by Roscoe C. Hawkins, resident vice-president, and Ernst V. Clark, resident assistant secretary. The bond for his first term was for $100,000, also, and was furnished by the American Surety Company.

TUG HIT BY CANADIAN CRUISER.

Her Captain Says He Was Fishing in United States Waters.

Erie, Pa.—The fish tug W. J. McCarter, of the Keystone Fish Company's fleet, limped into port with a big hole stove in her side by a shot from the Canadian cruiser Vigilant. Captain Frank Handy, of the McCarter, stated that as he was going after his nets about noon the Vigilant swooped down upon him before he was aware of her presence and fired upon him.

The shot struck the tug near the water line, wrecking the machinery used for pulling the nets. The McCarter hastily put for shore. Although in a leaking condition the tug managed to reach port in safety.

Captain Handy, of the tug boat, said they were in American waters when fired upon, and to make their position more secure they started to get further away, as there would be no doubt of their being in American waters.

SPANISH ASSASSINS AT WORK.

Republican Members of the Cortes Fired On at Valencia.

Madrid, Spain.—While Senores Ibanez and Pallares, Republican members of the Cortes, and a party of friends were leaving a meeting of the Republican Club at Valencia they were fired on from a cafe. Eight men were wounded and taken to the hospital, including Senor Pallares.

Several arrests were made. The city was disquieted and trouble was feared.

The Gold Stock.

Including bullion in the Treasury the actual stock of gold money in the United States on September 1, 1905, was $1,379,804,314.

Purchase 1,000 Tons Bessemer.

Youngstown, O.—The United States Steel Corporation has purchased from the Bessemer Pig Iron Association 10,000 tons of Bessemer pig at $15 valley forge, September delivery. It is unofficially said that the negotiations are on for the purchase of from 30,000 to 40,000 tons for February delivery.

Violent Deaths in Gurley.

Huntsville, Ala.—A special from Gurley states that three fatalities have occurred there in the last two or three days. The 4-year-old son of Horace Kennedy fell into a pot of boiling water and was so badly scalded that he died within a few minutes. Mr. Harris, a well-known citizen of that neighborhood, took an overdose of chill tonic by mistake and died from the effect of the drug in a few hours. A 14-year-old boy named Hill was thrown from a wagon on the Madison and Jackson road and one of the wheels of the heavily loaded wagon passed over his neck, killing him instantly.

Killed by Switch Engine.

Selma, Ala.—A telegram was received Friday by Mrs. B. B. Sadler announcing the death of her son, Lonnie, in Artesia, Miss., from being run over by a switch engine. The young man was at work as switchman for the Mobile and Ohio Railroad at Artesia about a month ago he had his foot crushed by a car and came to his former home to remain until he recovered. He went back to work last Monday, and while switching in the yards at Artesia he met his death beneath the iron wheels. He was only 21 years of age, and his death came as a great shock to his parents and loved ones. The remains have reached here, when the funeral will take place.

To Get Two New Railroads.

Birmingham, Ala.—From an authentic source it is learned that the Mobile and Ohio Railroad and the Illinois Central have perfected an agreement relative to the joint use of certain tracks which will bring both roads into Birmingham. The Illinois Central will come into Birmingham from Jasper over the Frisco tracks. Jasper will be reached over the tracks of the Northern Alabama from Haylesville, and the road will build from Corinth, Miss., to Haylesville. The deal will result in the Illinois Central using the tracks of the Mobile and Ohio from Jackson, Tenn., to Corinth. In return for the privilege the Mobile and Ohio will use the Illinois Central's line from Corinth to Haylesville. It will use the Northern Alabama to Jasper and probably the Ensley Southern into Birmingham.

Killed in Gin Accident.

Athens, Ala.—Frank Campbell, one of the leading citizens of this county residing at Ventoor, on the State line, where he was a large land owner, depot agent, postmaster and merchant, was killed Saturday at his place of business, being caught in his ginnery which had for the first time this season been started up. The machinery had just started when, in some manner, he became caught and his right arm dragged into the gin head and cut so badly that it had to be amputated at the shoulder and immediately after the operation he died.

Head-End Collision.

Opelika, Ala.—A head-on collision occurred on the Western Railway of Alabama at East Alabama Junction about two and one-half miles north of Opelika, between east-bound passenger train No. 40, which left Montgomery at 9:15 o'clock, and engine No. 32. Engine No. 40 was en route to Atlanta and engine No. 32 was en route to Opelika when the collision occurred. The train was in charge of Conductor Dillard and Engineer Wells. The light engine was in charge of Engineer Estes. The engineer and fireman of train No. 40 escaped and were not injured. Fireman Estes, on No. 32, jumped and was badly bruised. He was brought to the infirmary in Opelika. Both engines were badly wrecked. None of the passengers were injured, but the train considerably jarred.

Fire at Abbeville.

Abbeville, Ala.—The stables occupied by J. C. Espy & Bro. burned Friday night. It was with the greatest difficulty that the live stock was gotten out of the burning building. Two buggies and some harness, together with a carload of hay and grain, were consumed by the flames. The Farmers' Warehouse adjoins the stables, and several hundred bales of cotton were lying in the streets. Twenty-six bales were burned, and it was with difficulty that the remainder was saved. The barn of W. W. Espy, across the street from the stables, was also burned. By heroic efforts the Farmers' Warehouse and the residence of Carl Espy were saved from the flames.

Four Residences Burn in Anniston.

Anniston, Ala.—Four residences were destroyed by fire Friday in the southern part of the city, almost beyond the reach of plugs. Firemen were aided in saving several other residences that were in line with the flames. The flames originated from a defective flue in the house of L. T. R. Lester, occupied by J. B. Duke. The household effects of Dr. Duke, worth $250, were almost wholly destroyed. The house, valued at $600, was burned. Mr. Lester had $400 insurance. The household effects were uninsured. The total loss is $2,500.

Suicide Is the Theory.

Birmingham, Ala.—Suicide is the only theory Coroner Paris can advance for the death of James Cook, a young man, whose body was found in a secluded spot of the woods near Walker's chapel, a little church about six miles north of Birmingham. His aged mother and brothers hold the same view, and the evidence given at the inquest had a tendency to show that Cook was despondent. No one seemed to know the cause of his trouble, but it was brought out that he was addicted to drink. This is thought to have been the immediate cause of the rash deed.

Had a Narrow Escape.

Demopolis, Ala.—Thursday Balam Nixon, who lives about seven miles southeast of this city, had about as narrow an escape with his life as has ever been known. He was driving his buggy across the railroad crossing between the passenger and freight depots when his buggy was caught between two freight cars that were being switched. He managed to get out of the vehicle with only bruises on his legs. The buggy was a complete wreck. Nixon was carried to a doctor's office, where his injured limbs were dressed.

Rural Routes Established.

Washington, D. C.—Rural free delivery route No. 1 has been ordered established November 15 at Haleburg, Henry county, serving 345 people and 86 houses; Columbia, Houston county, route 4, population 416, houses 99; Shortersville, Henry county, route 2, population 440, houses 110.

George B. Rutledge appointed regular, George W. Martin substitute, rural carrier route 1, at Summerfield.

Percy C. Ramsay appointed regular, Eli Laney substitute, rural carrier route 1, at Daviston.

Subscribe for $125,000 of Stock.

Huntsville, Ala.—Huntsville and Madison county citizens have set to work to meet the proposition of the Nashville and Huntsville Railroad by subscribing to $125,000 of the stock. The railroad, which will be financed by the Knickerbocker Trust Company, of New York, will be built from Nashville to Birmingham. All counties in Tennessee have complied with the requirements of the company.

Secured Improvements.

Florence, Ala.—Dr. James T. Pitt, the Florence postmaster, will return from Washington, where he has been for the past few days looking after the interests of his office. A telegram from him announced that he had secured an additional clerk and arranged for the mail formerly carried on the 9 a. m. Southern train to be brought from Tuscumbia on the electric cars.

New Sheffield Incorporation.

Tuscumbia, Ala.—The certificate of incorporation of the King Stove and Range Company, of Sheffield, has been filed for record in the probate office in this city. The company is organized with a capital of $100,000, of which $25,000 is paid in, and will manufacture stoves, ranges, hollow ware, metal castings, agricultural implements, etc.

Young Man Killed.

Brewton, Ala.—News has reached here that on Sunday night near Ridgeway postoffice, a few miles north of Canoe Station, in this county, Burrell Glover, a young white man about 25 years of age, was murdered and robbed. The crime was committed about 10:30 o'clock, and the body was found several hours later with a bullet wound in the left side, ranging toward the heart, which is supposed to have produced instant death.

THE MODERATES WIN

Registration Board of Cuba Named—No Important Disturbance Reported.

PALMA'S PARTY THE WINNER.

Congressman and Police Chief Killed During Political Disturbance at Cienfuegos.

Havana, Cuba.—Returns from the entire island confirm the complete victory of the government in the elections for members of the boards of registration. There were no important disorders.

The election in Havana passed off quietly, and telegrams from the interior say there were no disorders except at Placetas, in the province of Santa Clara, where many shots were fired, but no one was killed.

The liberals admit the complete victory in Havana of the moderates, the party of President Palma. They claim that they did not vote because moderate policemen stationed at the polls prevented them from doing so. A representative of the Associated Press visited a majority of the polls here, but at none of them noted any indication of restraint on voters. Good order was maintained throughout the city, and with the exception of a man being shot and probably fatally injured and another being seriously hurt by a rock there has been no trouble.

Crowds which gathered in the Liberal Club rooms were dismissed by orators, who informed them that the moderates were victorious and requested the liberals to retire to their homes The Liberal Club was closed and barricaded. A number of liberals say that this was done because they had received word that the government intended to search the place for arms.

Dead Officials Buried.

Official dispatches received from Cienfuegos announce that the bodies of Congressman Villuendas and Chief of Police Illance, who were killed during a disturbance at the Hotel La Suiza, were buried. Liberals who formerly were soldiers carried the body of Villuendas to the grave on their shoulders, and the same honor was shown to Illance by moderates.

The government claims to have discovered a liberal plot to dynamite the city hall, court house and other public buildings of Cienfuegos.

Liberals, it is asserted, tried to corrupt the secretary of the chief of police, offering a large bribe. The secretary accepted the money and then told the chief. This led to a search of the Hotel La Suiza and the discovery of dynamite bombs and other explosives in Villuendas' room.

No American Intervention.

Acting Secretary Adee, at Washington, has received a cablegram from Jacob Sleeper, the American charge at Havana in Minister Squeirs' absence, relative to the riot in Cienfuegos, which was nothing more than a confirmation of the report received from his government by Minister Quesada. It is stated at the state department that nothing has yet developed warranting any thought of intervention by this government in Cuban affairs.

Slain and Burned.

Jacksonville, Fla.—The charred remains of Lulu Wise and her four children were found in the smoking ruins of her home, near this place, which was burned before daylight. The skulls of the woman and all of her children were crushed, indicating that they had been murdered and the house burned to conceal the crime. The woman had not lived with her husband for two years. At that time it was stated that he beat her and threatened to kill her. She had him arrested, and he was sentenced to jail for a short term. After the expiration of his sentence he disappeared, and it could not be ascertained that any one had heard from him. The woman supposed he was dead. A coroner's jury was summoned, but the hearing was adjourned until next Thursday.

Two Hundred Jews Arrested.

Warsaw, Poland.—The police have surrounded parks in which thousands of Jews were promenading. All of them were searched and 200 placed under arrest.

Ginners to Issue Report.

Dallas, Tex.—Announcement is made by the National Ginners' Association that it will issue its first report of bales ginned up to the night of September 25 in time to reach its members on Saturday morning, September 30, or Monday morning, October 2. It is stated that this report will not be as complete as the next one, which is to be issued on October 18, as by that time the association will have its force better organized.

Girl Is in Trouble.

Mexico, Mo.—A deputy United States marshal from St. Louis Friday arrested Miss Dixie Tuttle, aged 23, daughter of Thomas Tuttle, reputed to be one of the wealthiest farmers in Audrain county, on the charge of having sent improper letters and postal cards through the mails. The letters and postals concerned were signed "Charlie," and violently attacked Miss Eighty One Turley, a school teacher. After an investigation covering six months the postal authorities arrested Miss Tuttle, charging her with sending them. She prptests her innocence. The arrest has caused a sensation here.

Rear End Collision.

Epes, Ala.—A rear end collision of a fast and local freight occurred two miles south of here. Engineer Addison, Fireman Coleman and a brakeman of the through train jumped, and each sustained slight injuries. The train crew on the caboose of the local freight saw the approach of the other train in time to get off and escaped without injury. Eight cars of the local were demolished, the caboose of which was literally torn to pieces. The engine of the through freight was badly damaged and placed across the track, and a number of cars attached were derailed. After seven hours' delay traffic was resumed. W. D. Addison, the injured engineer, lives at Birmingham. He was placed on the north-bound and sent home.

Woman Arrested.

Chicago, Ill.—Much secrecy is being used by the police regarding a woman prisoner who was arrested Saturday night by Detective Kane, of Chicago, and Detective Prim, of Cincinnati, O. The woman is being held in connection with a $3,500 diamond robbery, which is said to have taken place in the Ohio city several weeks ago. The prisoner gave her name to the police as Annie Brady. Chief of Police Collins issued an order to the policemen at the station where she is being held to allow no persons to see her. The alleged robbery for which the woman is being held is said to have occurred when she was employed as a servant. She is said to have taken money and jewelry worth $3,500 from her mistress.

Loads of Buckshot.

Beaumont, Tex.—A double murder occurred at Lockport, La., near Lake Charles, Saturday night, R. B. Holloway, of that place, and Tom Bowman, of Orange, Tex., being the victims. The identity of the assassin has not yet been determined. Bowman and another man from Orange were in Holloway's saloon, when Bowman stepped out of the front door, going home. A minute elapsed, when a shot rang out, and Holloway, who was standing behind the bar, received a load of buckshot in his left side, below the heart, and fell to the floor. He expired in a few minutes. Fifteen minutes later another shot was heard, and upon investigation the dead body of Bowman was found a short distance from the saloon, the top of his head being blown off.

Infant's Body Found.

Birmingham, Ala.—The body of an infant, with part of its head off, was found by Dan Weaver, a negro, and a young white boy near North Birmingham Park and the fact reported to the coroner, who is making a thorough investigation. Due to the fine silks and linen in which the body was clad, Coroner Paris is of the opinion that people of means know something of the affair, and he thinks there was murder. The body was found under a rock, which covered a hole which had been made by nature.

Alleged Distillers Bound Over.

Troy, Ala.—Deputy Marshal C. M. Cox brought to Troy Seaborn Taylor, Henry Taylor and Sam Taylor, charged with jointly operating an illicit distillery near Newville, in Henry county. They were arraigned before Commissioner Tutwiler and bound over to await the action of the next federal grand jury. An illicit distillery reported to belong to the Taylors was raided by the officers several weeks ago, but no arrests were made until the 20th inst.

Two Deaths From Cholera.

St. Petersburg.—Two deaths from cholera have occurred at Blockawek, on the Vistula river. The victims were members of the same family in which a death from cholera was reported last Wednesday.

To Raise Cantaloupes.

Athens, Ala.—The farmers of this section have become quite interested in the growth of berries and cantaloupes, and to this end the Athens Strawberry and Cantaloupe Growers' Association has been organized, with many of the leading farmers of this section as members, and already more than 100 acres have been pledged to the association to be planted by the owners in the two fruits for the next season.

AGREEMENT REACHED

Norway and Sweden Make a Tranquil Adjustment and are Friends.

DISSOLUTION AND NOT WAR.

After Protracted Session of Conference Delegates Get Together on All Points.

Karlstad.—After protracted sessions extending over some week the Norwegian and Swedish delegates who met here to settle the terms of separation of the two countries have arrived at an agreement on all points. The terms were not made public.

In anticipation of the agreement large crowds assembled around the buildings in which the meetings had been held to witness the departures of the delegates. The Norwegians emerged upon the conclusion of the session and were on their way to Christiana a few minutes after an announcement was made of the outcome of the negotiations. The Swedish delegates remained inside for some time, but when they did show themselves they received an ovation and were escorted to their hotel by crowds which sang the Swedish anthem. They left at midnight for stockholm.

The delegates refused to discuss the terms of the agreement, simply saying that they would be given out early next week. An agreement had been anticipated for some days, as both sides had been adopting conciliatory attitudes. The negotiations which are now concluded are peculiar in nature. On one side the delegates were former Swedish ministers who at the time of the Riksdag decision were leading members of the committee which framed the Swedish conditions to assent to dissolution. On the other side the delegates were men who led Norway in its revolution of June 7, but who were not guided by any decision of the storthing. On the contrary, their every act was looked upon with suspicion by men more radical.

When Sweden's conditions were made known many voices in Norway were raised against acceding to them. Premier Michelsen, of Norway, was more conservative and, seeing the consequences to Norway of a breach, was willing to enter into an agreement so long as it was honored by Norway and preserved as much as possible her national pride.

To Preserve Friendship.

The purpose of the Swedish delegates was to make a provision preserving the good feeling of the two peoples. From this viewpoint, of course, Sweden was compelled to insist on the demolition of the frontier fortifications which Norway, notwithstanding the close connections of the two countries, had erected against Sweden's entirely unfortified frontier.

The first purpose of the Swedish delegates was to hurt as little as possible the feelings of Norway, and the Swedish delegates throughout the proceedings have tried to find a way in which the fortress located farthest from the frontier could be made less threatening, while the others, they contended, should be demolished. It is believed this point was successfully carried.

The Swedish delegates were also anxious to preserve free and untrammeled the intercourse between the two countries, and they therefore proposed that certain agreements be made regarding transit and waterways which were equal in benefit to both and which would prevent one country from interfering with the other. It is believed that these matters were also settled to the satisfaction of both sides.

Finally Sweden did not consider that she could leave unprotected the interests of the poor Normandie Lanplanders, who, for their very existence, depended upon the use of pastures in both countries at different seasons for their reindeer. The Norwegians held out against the granting of this right, which had been established for centuries, but it is thought they at last gave in.

That Sweden never objected to an arbitration is shown by the Riksdag decision, in which arbitration was first mentioned and which agreed perfectly with Sweden's expressed desire for peace.

"BABY TOWERS" OF CHINA.

How Unwelcome Female Children Are Disposed of.

In some sections of China, it is said, from 20 to 25 per cent of all the female babies born are either drowned or thrown into what is known as the baby towers." The baby towers are situated outside the walled cities. Infants consigned to them are placed on the window sill, near the top of the tower, there to be pushed inside by the next comer. Poverty is the assigned cause. The parents claim that if, in their destitute circumstances, they allowed their female children to grow up to womanhood it would be but to sell them into slavery. The missionaries in that country rescue many of these infants from the window of the tower and care for them. In order to do this watch must be kept on these towers day and night. Many such infants, under the right training, have become native missionaries. There is a maxim in China, however, that the parents who preserve the lives of their female children will be rewarded by the kindness and love of their daughters, and, while the custom does prevail among some of the poor, there are many who take excellent care of their little ones.—New York Herald.

SNAKE WAS TOO FRIENDLY.

Reptile Crawled Over Young Farmer Without Hurting Him.

One day last week Aaron Hoffman had an experience with a rattler which he will not soon forget. While sprouting potatoes in the bin near the house he was conscious of something rubbing against his back, and glancing over his shoulder found that an immense rattlesnake had raised its head and was in the act of crawling up on his back.

The sight froze the blood in his veins, and he was too paralyzed with fear to move, and while he sat there the snake crawled over his shoulder and across his knee and into his hiding place. When young Hoffman did recover his powers of locomotion he ran into the house, but the reaction from the terrible fright completely prostrated him and he was unable for some little time to tell his mother the cause of the fright.

It is a well known fact that the rattlesnake, unless disturbed, will not strike, but even this fact does not make him a neighbor to be enjoyed. —Madras Pioneer.

Petrified Horns.

A peculiar pair of horns was found by Harley Henderson of Hoxie, Kan., and Frank Lee of Hill City, Kan., one and a half miles southeast of Hoxie, thirty-five feet below the surface of the ground.

The specimen is petrified and in a perfect state of preservation, notwithstanding the ages it is supposed to have remained beneath the ground.

Many conjectures have been made as to what sort of bovine this magnificent pair of horns must one time have adorned.

Following the curves of the horns from tip to tip the distance is 8 feet 9 inches, but straight across it is 7 feet. The circumference of the horns next to the skull is 20 inches. The distance between the horns across the skull is 15 inches.—Topeka Capital.

Bog Hoe on Its Travels.

Under the headline "Bog Hoe" the following advertisement appeared in the Lebanon, N. H., papers: "I, Charles Nurse, had a lot of hay cocks up in a field. I hung a bog hoe on a tree near. In the night the bog hoe carried a lot of hay and strewed it around in the woods and the bog hoe forgot to come back. If any one meets bog hoe with a bundle of hay, tell hoe it better be attending to the plumming business."

Man Has Real Monopoly.

It is said that a peculiar state of affairs exists on one of the islands on the Pacific coast that is famous for its fishing. One man has the sole right to catch fish in a net off the coast of the island, and then to offer them for sale as bait. Fishing is all that there is to do on the island, so everyone is dependent on this man. But he has a trick of getting drunk once a week or so, and then does not catch any bait, so no one can go fishing until he sobers off again.

INSURANCE FOR THE CRIMINAL.

Professional Thieves Pay Big Money for Protection.

"Criminal insurance," said a detective, "is the insurance that thieves and blacklegs take out in case of arrest. For instance: You are a second-story man. You make about $2,500 a year, the average second-story man's income, and you carry an insurance of $1,000, for which you pay the big premium of $125 a year. Now, if you are arrested the insurance company steps forward and hands you $1,000. Thus you are able to get the best of the lawyers for your defense. Receivers of stolen goods are usually rich, and it is these men as a rule who carry on the criminal insurance business. I know of a criminal insurance company in Philadelphia, another in New York and a third in St. Louis. The policies run from $100 up to $5,000 and the premiums are always enormous. This is because the danger of arrest is so great. Besides the criminal insurance concerns, I know of a curious beneficial organization that is conducted among the criminals of Illinois. Each member of the organization pays in $1 a week and in case of imprisonment his family receives $5 weekly as long as his sentence lasts."

COONS CAUSE MUCH TROUBLE.

Uncle Sam Raises Game Fowls and the Animals Eat Them Up.

The Feredal government and the State of Louisiana will probably have to abandon their plan to use Breton island, on the coast, as a preserve for the propogation of prairie hens and other fowls, owing to the immense numbers of raccoons that have preempted the claim.

Although the island is a small one, it is said by the game wardens that within its few square miles there must be 5,000 to 10,000 coons.

About 15,000 prairie hens were hatched this year, and as soon as they became of an eatable size they were devoured by the 'coons. The same has happened to other varieties of game fowl which the government endeavored to propagate on the island.

The Breton islands are some distance from the mainland and difficult of access. It was for this reason that they were selected as a preserve. But the 'coons have spoiled all the plans.

A force of trappers and hunters is to be sent to the island after the 'coons, but so great is their number that it is feared they cannot be exterminated.—New York Herald.

English Funeral 300 Years Ago.

The funerals were grand spectacles. The pallbearers were dressed in Franciscan habit, a relic of old Catholic times.

Snake in Old Swimming Hole.

A big snake has taken up its abode in White Creek, a branch of the Clyde river, seven miles east of this village.

Mrs. Heber Munson was driving in that vicinity recently and saw this snake lying across the road, its head hidden in the grass and weeds on one side, and its tail on the other. Mrs Munson stopped her horse, and set up a scream that caused the snake to crawl away and drop into the creek.

This snake has been seen at intervals for more than a year, and truthful eye witnesses declare that it is anywhere from ten to fifteen feet long and big in other respects.

The snake has appropriated a deep part of the creek which was a favorite swimming hole of the boys living in that region. But they do not swim there now.—Clyde correspondence Rochester Post-Express.

Lightning Brought Double Death.

A man and his little daughter were struck by lightning on Parliament Hill Fields, London, recently, and were killed instantaneously. The father had an artificial leg, and it was seen that the lightning struck the steel work of this and passed up into the body, the clothing on the left side being torn and burnt. The electric current seems to have passed from him through the body of his little girl, who was holding his hand. She bore no marks upon her, but her left shoe was torn to pieces.

Cat Has Vegetarian Tastes.

East Norwalk, Conn., has a cat which seems to be a vegetarian by preference. Although she at times eats meat sparingly, she prefers to make a glutton of herself on raw string beans. Many pods have been found in gardens near her home which have been completely devoured. She also partakes freely of green peas and asparagus.

Linking of Coincidences.

Fire broke out on the roof of F. E. Young's blacksmith shop at Enosburgh Falls, Vt., on July 25. Exactly three years previous to a day a fire broke out on the same roof in the same spot and, stranger yet, the same customer, Edward Brady, was having his horse shod at the time.

BABY GIRAFFE AT BERLIN.

Attendant Makes Careful Nurse for Beautiful Little Stranger.

A giraffe was born in captivity in the Berlin zoological gardens a fortnight ago. At its birth the giraffe, a male, weighed 111 pounds, but it has since gained another 100 pounds, although the mother does not nourish it.

In an attendant at the "zoo" the beautiful creature has found a careful and tender nurse. He helps the young animal to get on its weak, straggling legs in the morning, and puts it snugly to bed at night.

The little giraffe drinks about four quarts of milk daily fresh from the cow, and the strangely assorted pair walk about the gardens together, the man watching over the uncertain steps of his companion with solicitude.

The tall-limbed youngster appears to reciprocate this tenderness, for it may often be seen rubbing his head against the man's shoulder. It sleeps apart from its parents. The father treats it with quiet unconcern, but the mother often peers over the tall partition at her offspring.

The attendant, saluting in military fashion, announced to Director Hick that the newcomer was already practising the mastication of grass and cakes. The man looked as happy as though he had just discovered the first tooth in the mouth of his own child.

FOUND A PIRATE SHIP.

California Man Has Visions of Gold in the Buried Hulk.

While excavating for a cellar an eighth of a mile from the shore line at Larkin cove, Los Angeles, Welcome Riggs came upon the hulk of an ancient vessel, supposed to be a Spanish galleon. The anchor, which is badly rust-eaten, is of a pattern used a century or more ago.

The sea must have extended much farther inland at that point at one time, and the vessel was probably driven ashore in a storm and wrecked. It is believed that it is the relict of one of the pirate ships which preyed upon this coast about 100 years ago.

It is known that some of these vessels were wrecked upon the shore in this vicinity, and three of the survivors of one of the wrecked pirate ships made their way to San Gabriel mission and professed repentance.

Mr. Riggs will excavate the entire wreck and search for any hidden treasure it may contain. The iron portions of the ship are nearly rusted out, but the wood is in a fair state of preservation.—New York World.

Thunder's Warnings.

The "Prognostication Everlasting of One Leonard Digges," published in 1556, tells us that thunder in the morning denotes wind; at noon, rain, and in the evening a great tempest. He goes further still, and declares that "Sunday's thunder should bring the death of learned men, judges and others; Monday's, the death of women; Tuesday's, plenty of grain; Wednesday's, bloodshed; Thursday,'s, plenty of sheep and corn; Friday's, the slaughter of a great man and other horrible murders; Saturday,'s, a general pestilent plague and great dearth."

A Black Lily.

In the island of Luzon, one of the Philippines, a lily or tulip with a black flower, eight or nine inches across, has been discovered by an American. It flowers before the leaves appear, and has an odor of tainted flesh, which attracts insects to it for the purpose of cross fertilization. It stands under a foot high, and grows in the shade of dense vegetation. Altogether it upsets our notions of the pure lily, and reminds us of the vulture among birds.

A boat towed by a captive balloon has been a curious feature at Atlantic City recently.

Little Girls as Stowaways.

Three little girls have the town of Millinocket, Me., a good scare last week. They disappeared mysteriously and search failed to reveal their whereabouts until some hours later when they were found in the town of Sherman, twelve miles away. They had played stowaway on a train in order to get there.

SOUP FROM RARE MEAT.

Meal of Brussels Sailor Not Likely to Be Duplicated.

Jacques Lebrun, a sailor of Brussels, enjoyed not long ago a dish that should make epicures envious. He had a soup the like of which may have been tasted thousands upon thousands of years ago, but which no man will probably taste again.

It reminds one of the case of the rude laborers who were disinterring Pompeii, who found the skins of wine and drank every drop as an accompaniment of the crusts that made the rest of their luncheon.

Never a connoisseur got a taste of that rare wine—rare and so mellow with age.

Now, Lebrun is a sailor, and he is temporarily working as a day laborer on the canal works at Ternenzen.

The other day he found in the ground a large bone, which he took home to his wife to have it boiled down for soup.

The bone, which was unearthed at a depth of twenty-two feet, it has now been found, was part of the skeleton of a mammoth.

The "Horn Dance."

Among the quaint old customs and ceremonies still alive in country districts in England, there is only one "horn dance," and that is to be found at Abbots Bromley, in Staffordshire. Every year, at the village wake, the dance is still carried out. The origin of the horn dance is lost in the midst of history, but it has been traced back as far as the eleventh century. Until the seventeenth century it was practised at Christmas, on New Year's day and on Twelfth day. In the time of Henry VIII. the dance was performed in front of the church every Sunday, and a collection for the poor taken up from the spectators.

Died as He Had Predicted.

About a year ago a Mr. Legare of St. Eustache, near Quebec, startled his wife by saying: "I am going to die to-night, but you must not trouble yourself about it. I am going to arrange everything in such a manner as to give you as little worry as possible." Mme. Legaré naturally thought that her husband, who appeared to be in perfect health, was joking; but, true to his word, he began to arrange his affairs, made all the necessary preparations for his funeral, and, when the last detail had been concluded, suddenly expired.

A sensational incident occurred recently at St. Heliers, Jersey, when a horse harnessed to a cart bolted down sixty-five steps, which are shown above. Little or no damage happened to either animal or vehicle.

Presidential Ticket of 1861.

In tearing down the old courthouse at Lake Village, Ark., an election ticket used November 6, 1861, was found. The ticket reads: "For President, Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi; for vice-president, Alex H. Stephens, of Georgia; for electors, Edward Cross, of Hempstead; David Walker, of Washington; John R. Hampton, of Bradley; W. C. Bevins, of Independence; W. W. Mansfield, of Franklin; for congress, 3d district, A. H. Garland, of Pulaski." Judge Mansfield, of Franklin is said to be the only survivor of those named with him on this ticket.

Ask Reciprocal Policy.

A Sunapee, N. H., correspondent expounds the doctrine of recoupment as understood by the people of that village in the following terms: "Bartlett & Rowell of the hame shop kindly consented to omit the 5:30 whistle in the morning at the request of the city comers, and we do not think it would be asking too much of the city boys to omit singing, or rather trying to sing, through our streets at 12 and 1 o'clock at night, for there are working people in our midst who would be glad to sleep during sleeping hours."

Power Conveyed Far.

In the anthracite coal regions the transmission of steam power to distant machinery has been carried to extraordinary lengths because of the cheapness of coal relatively to the labor required for running engines. In one case the pipe is said to be a mile long and pipes from 2,000 to 4,000 feet in length are not uncommon near Scranton. Of course the metal is well wrapped in nonconducting material, usually asbestos or magnesia, to lessen the waste of heat by radiation.

BRIDE'S CAKE IS ROMAN.

It Used to Be Broken Over Her Head After the Ceremony.

The custom of having a special cake at weddings came from the Romans. This cake, or rather biscuit, signified fruitfulness, hospitality and prosperity. The rice that was showered on a bride had a similar meaning.

For many centuries after the Romans left England, the custom was to break the biscuit over the bride's head, and then the fragments were picked up and piled before her for distribution to her friends.

At the restoration Charles II returned with a small army of French cooks, who speedily converted the ancient biscuit into a delicious piece of confectionery, iced it with sugar and gradually adorned it with emblematical devices, till it towered into the amazing structure which the luxury of later times has developed.—Stray Stories.

Horse Shoe Trick.

Prop a horse shoe magnet up between two upright posts, which should be tacked to the bottom of a box, then put a pasteboard cover on the box and scatter steel shavings over it. They will form in circles while whirling from one magnet to the other.

Copperhead Around His Neck.

Monday evening James A. Allen, who lives in Annandale, went into his haymow to get a bundle of hay for his horse. When he picked the hay up he pressed it against the mow to get a better grip on it, and as he did so noticed what he thought was a strap fall against his neck with a very cold feeling.

Just then he reached the light, and to his horror found that it was not a strap, but a live copperhead snake that had been caressing his juglar. A copper is a very quick reptile, but in this instance Allen landed before his snakeship could strike.

Just what happened Mr. Allen can't relate, but the snake is dead, and died so suddenly that Allen's recollections of the windup are very hazy and confused. Mr. Allen says he has had enough copper about his neck to satisfy him for the rest of his life.—Moundsville Herald.

Sneeze Won His Heart.

The expression, "falling in love" is good. No man ever got in love unless he fell in. A. fell in love with Miss B.'s neck; C. fell in love with Miss D.'s ribbons; E. fell in love with Miss F.'s teeth; G. fell in love with Miss H.'s hair; I. fell in love with Miss J.'s walk; K. fell in love with Miss L.'s throat; M. fell in love with Miss N.'s hands; O. fell in love with Miss P's ears, etc. But the strangest falling in ever heard of was by Colonel ——, who was a celibate of 48, then suddenly married. "How did she catch me?" he says. "By sneezing. I had never seen her in my life. I heard her sneeze. I loved her instantly. Ah, such a sneeze! It was so ladylike, so refined, so elegant! Something said in my heart, 'Colonel, a woman who can sneeze in that way is a queen, a pearl beyond price, an angel!'"—New York Press.

Egyptian Lantern.

Lanterns, such as these, were used by ancient Egyptians to hang across streets during wedding festivities.

Malingering Animals.

It is said that certain animals often pretend to be ill so they will not have to do things that are distasteful to them. This is particularly true of cavalry horses. Often they will pretend to be lame so as to get out of attending drill.

The oldest person on the state pension rolls in Maine is Eli Cook of Belfast. Mr. Cook, who is a veteran of the Aroostook war, has passed the century mark and has two sons, veterans of the civil war, who also draw pensions.

IDEA CAME FROM SHEFFIELD.

First Commercial Traveler Sent From That City.

It has generally been supposed that the commercial traveler is a product of our own busy day, but as early as 1757 a Sheffield cutlery manufacturer conceived the idea of sending to the continent glib talkers to convince merchants that the English cutlery was superior to that of local manufacturers, and so marked was the success that it was not long before the same idea was put into practice in other lines.

As early as 1765 the term "bagman" had become common, the word being defined in Murray's Dictionary of that year, the example being quoted from Goldsmith.

The title "commercial traveler" is the only modern part of the idea the ancient bagman lasting until the improvements in travel caused the term to become obsolete.

In earlier years the salesman traveled with his samples in a bag strapped to his horse's back and moved from place to place and it was not until the passing of the stage coach days that the sample trunk became the feature of the traveler's outfit.

HAD GOOD BAG OF SNAKES.

Colorado Schoolma'am Is Sure Death to Reptiles.

Mrs. Emma Herey Meyer felt a glow of pride as she gazed—at a respectful distance—at the trophies of the chase brought to her office by her pupil Miss Rachel Hitchman, schoolma'am at Hale, Republican, river, Kit Carson county, Colo.

The package, unrolled, showed five skins of snakes killed by the schoolma'am.

Miss Hitchman killed a big rattler that appeared among her pupils one day and threatened damage. She took a club. The snakes were stunned by her, too, and she sought Mrs. Meyer to accept one of the biggest to be made into a belt.

Miss Hitchman is a city-bred girl and a year ago appealed to Mrs. Meyer to get her a position as teacher away out on the prairie. This was done. After nine months' experience she returns to Denver delighted with her adventures. Her education included snake killing and snake skinning, lariat throwing and riding a la cowboy. —Denver Republican.

Stumbled Into Rich Mine.

Nannie Brown, eighteen years old, a negro servant, while searching for a stray cow near the Homestake mine, half a mile east of Butte, stumbled into a gopher hole out of which had been thrown several small particles of quartz in which gold glittered. The girl carried the sparkling rock home and assays in Butte show that the rock carries more than $1,000 in gold to the ton. The girl led her employers to the gopher hole and the whole country was staked off, the locaters being "Con" Conklin, S. W. Brown, "Al" Stevens and Miss Brown, each taking an equal share. Two shafts have been sunk thirty feet, revealing two large gold leads in which the free gold can be easily seen. About $600 worth of rock is in sight and excitement runs high over the discovery.

True Warning of Death.

A remarkable case of a dream warning was that of Mr. Henry Gay, of Abertillery, Monmouthshire, Eng., who on Feb. 19, 1901, had a vivid dream, in which he declared he was standing with a "radiant presence" in a shining cornfield. His companion gathered four ripe ears of corn and handed them to him with the words, "These are all for thee." Mr. Gay immediately told Rev. D. Collier, of Abertillery, of his strange dream, and said he was convinced that he had four more years to live, a conviction which no argument could shake. Exactly four, later, on Feb. 19, 1905, Mr. Gay died.

Prize for Antiquarians.

An important antiquarian discovery is reported from Inch Abbey, County Down, where an oblong stone, with a crucifix and two attendant figures carved in low relief, has been unearthed. Judged from the position of the feet, which are crossed, the workmanship is of the twelfth or thirteenth century, as most eleventh century crucifixes have the feet nailed apart. It is intended to convey the stone to Downpatrick for inspection during the forthcoming visit of the Royal Society of Irish Antiquarties.

He Knows, of Course

"No, love," she said, "I do not say
That I will give you all the space
In closet, bureau, trunk—I may Ask for myself a little space.
But you shall have your very own,
The thing that you have languished for:
Yes, you, because I love you, love,
Shall have the lowest bureau drawer."

He thanked her. What else could he do?
For well he knew her fond intent
To prove her love was wondrous true,
Of sacrifice and yearning blent.
"Oh, love," he said, "full well I know
The wondrous love, affection sweet,
That prompts you now to promise me
A bureau drawer as mine, complete."

'Twas almost ten sweet years ago,
And ever since when he has gone
Unto that drawer he's found, you know,
Satins and laces, silks and lawn,
And women's gloves, and bric-a-brac
And things no man would e'er disclose;
But still he minds it not at all,
For he is married and—he knows.

A MINE ROMANCE

BY FRANK H. SWEET

(Copyright, 1905, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

"That is all, I believe," said Battlesea as he rose and buttoned his coat across his breast. "I saw the Englishman in New York, and he will be on here next week. Have the report very specific, this and that vein outcropping at the surface, so much ore to the ton, and so many tons excavated with but a minimum of expense. He has unlimited money to squander, and is wild to throw it into mine holes; but he likes details. Give it to him in the way of veins and promising indications and computations. And, oh, yes, while about it you might take a peep in Faxon's mine adjoining. Make a few golden notes about that also. After purchasing from me, the Englishman may as well buy out Faxon. The two mines could be operated as one. We will impress that on him—after we have sold. Old Faxon can't afford to hire a mine expert himself and I shall be glad to help him a little. Make the reports all right. The Englishman has heard of you and will accept the report without question. You understand?"

Yes, Clint Bayland understood, and he understood the significance of a small roll which Battlesea's hand dropped carelessly upon his desk as he turned and went out. It was a first installment for his reputation. And Clara Faxon, the most beautiful girl in twenty miles round, was the daughter of the old man whom Battlesea would be glad to help.

He walked irritably to the window of the office and looked out, not daring to trust his eyes with a second glance at the small roll on his desk. He did need the money, sorely, more than he would care to have any one know. And it was only an indication of what would come. With Battlesea, who owned more mine and town property than any ten men in the country, as his friend, his prosperity would be assured.

But somehow, the thought of the prosperity did not give him the pleasure that it ought. Oddly enough his mind went over the snow-clad peaks to the mother he had left in the East, and from her to—Clara Faxon. What would they think?

A smart runabout swung up to the office door, and a handsome young fellow of about his own age raised a beckoning finger. The other occupant of the runabout was Clara Faxon. Clint left the window and went to the door.

"Hello, Bayland," the man called affably, "be busy to-morrow?"

"In the morning, yes. But I can spare you part of the afternoon, Mr. Deele, or that will do."

"Nicely. I want you to take a run through my mine and make a report of its general characteristics. I haven't looked it much yet, but the indications I think point to a good thing. However, there's a rumor of a big syndicate's buyer approaching and if so we will sell if we can get our price. Say two sharp, and I will be ready to go through with you."

"Very well. You may look for me."

As the runabout whirled away, Clara Faxon's eyes flashed him a smiling glance over her shoulder. Of late he had thought her manner a shade more friendly. Perhaps even Battlesea and Mr. Deele— But, pshaw! and he turned abruptly and went back into the office. At the desk he stood for fully a minute, gazing down at the roll, the fine wrinkles again coming between his brows. Then with an impatient movement he swept the roll into his desk and turned the key. Some chance visitor might come in and notice it lying there.

The next day his examination of Battlesea's mine turned out as he feared—the property was absolutely worthless as an investment. And Faxon's was no better. The only difference was that old Faxon believed implicitly in his mine, while Battlesea did not. So in selling, at whatever price, one would be honest and the other a self-conscious swindler.

From Faxon's mine, Clint went straight to Deele's, a quarter of a mile away, expecting the same result. But when he left it, late in the afternoon, there was a strange look on his face. He had examined many mines, some of them very rich, but none had been like Deele's. If he made a conscientious report this would be the mine sold, at a fabulous price, and Deele, from being merely a prosperous man, would become an immensely rich one. Moreover, it would make Battlesea his bitter enemy, and practically would mean his ruin at this place. And ruin, of course, meant losing whatever chance he had of winning Clara Faxon.

"You did nobly, and I—"

The wrinkles were deep in his forehead when he entered the office and dropped down at his desk, his head upon his arms. He wanted to think, to reason the thing out in a sensible, practical manner, but could not. His mother kept slipping in between him and his thoughts, and with her came Clara Faxon. He knew what his mother's searching eyes meant, and he fancied there was something in the girl's straight gaze that looked out upon life in much the same way. But she was on the other side of the black gulf, and he must step across to reach her. Once there, by her side, with those eyes as inspiration, he felt there could be no heights too great, no plains too broad, for them to compass together.

It was a long, bitter fight, lasting through the night and into the gray dawn of the next day; but in the end his mother won, and with haggard face he made the small roll into a secure package and returned it to Battlesea by his office boy, stating it was something that had been left in his office by mistake. Then from his notes he made out the reports for the three mines.

One afternoon, a week later, while writing to the management of a mining company in another state in regard to a position, he heard someone enter, but, thinking it the office boy, did not turn. Then:

"I—I beg your pardon, Mr. Bayland. Can I speak with you a moment?"

He whirled in his chair, to find Clara Faxon standing before him, her face a little pale, but her eyes glowing.

"Oh, Mr. Bayland," she cried impetuously, before he could speak: "Papa, and Mr. Battlesea are so angry with you. I thought you must have done something dreadful from the way they have been talking; but this morning I learned just how it was, and hurried here thinking you might feel bad at their being angry. You did nobly, and I—everybody ought to be proud of you. I—I——" She stopped suddenly, confusedly, for he had caught both her hands and was gazing into her eyes in a way that could not be misunderstood. Her breath quickened a little, then the eyes met his squarely, and the hands were not withdrawn.

The Pace That Kills.

"I wrote him a neat letter asking for the position."

"Did he answer?"

"Yes. Said that a man who takes time to dot his i's is too slow for him."

FAT RAFFERTY AND THE TELLER

Doubt as to His Identity Worried This Irishman.

There is a rule in one at least of the savings banks in Massachusetts that when a passbook is presented with an order for payment from the depositor the identification of the payee is required for amounts exceeding $100.

One day an Irishman, evidently not long in this country, appeared at the paying teller's window for a draft of $123, presenting a passbook and an order from the owner of the book to pay Patrick Rafferty the amount.

The order was in proper form, but the payee was not known to the teller.

"Do you know any of the officers here?" he asked of Pat.

"No, sor," replied Pat.

"Well, then, you will have to be identified to us in some way."

"What's that?" asked the now confused Irishman.

"Why," explained the teller, "you will have to get some one whom we know and who knows you to come in here and identify you. You might be anybody, and we want to be sure that we are paying Patrick Rafferty."

Pat looked dazed and went over to a seat and for ten or fifteen minutes looked stupidly at the passbook and order.

Finally he approached the window again, with the most dubious look imaginable on his face, and said, "Say, young feller, if I'm not Pat Rafferty, who the divil am I?"

Dead or Not, He Was Buried.

Over twenty years ago S. P. Ives, a well-known legal light of Essex county, and Charles P. Thompson of the superior court were pitted against each other in an important life insurance case at Salem, Mr. Ives for the company and Mr. Thompson for the plaintiff. Mr. Thompson was very anxious to put into the case certain affidavits, and Mr. Ives was equally strenuous in opposition.

After lengthy arguments the judge decided in Mr. Thompson's favor, and he proceeded to read, with much emphasis, depositions relating to surgical treatment, death, funeral and last the interment of the insured.

As Mr. Thompson finished reading this, which was from a sexton of the cemetery, giving name, date, number of burial lot, etc., he threw the papers upon the table and, addressing the judge, said, with a bit of impediment in speech which sometimes bothered him: "There, your honor. P-perhaps Bro. Ives don't be-believe this man is dead! B-but we've b-buried him, anyway."—Boston Herald.

Why He Hadn't Kissed Her.

On Sixth avenue yesterday afternoon a handsomely dressed woman with a profusion of blonde hair was walking by the side of her husband. As the couple passed a department store the woman's attention was attracted by a tailor-made gown, and she left her husband to examine it more closely. When she returned she seemed annoyed. "You never look at anything that interests me any more," she complained. "You don't care how I dress. You don't care for me any more. Why, you haven't even kissed me for a month."

"Indeed, I am sorry, but it is not my fault," said the man to whom she had just been speaking.

Turning the woman looked at him, gasped and mumbled out an apology. She had taken the arm of a stranger. —New York Press.

A Modern Convenience.

When Albert Bigelow Paine, the experinced author of "The Van Dwellers," was looking about him for a home in suburban New York before he found his nest on Long Island, he was interviewed by a farmer who had a house to sell somewhere up the country. He described the place in sunset and sunrise and green field and yellow grain colors, and Mr. Paine listened.

"Has the house any of the modern conveniences?" he asked.

"You bet it has," replied the farmer with enthusiasm.

"Is that so?"

"Yes, siree; it's got the very latest—there's a trolley car runs within a half mile of the front door."

Good Night!

"Good night!" so low and sweet
The homely phrase resounds
With far re-echoed beat
Beyond the garden bounds,
"Good night!" the jasmine sighs,
"Good night!" the rose replies.

"Good night!" as sad and clear
As song of nightingale
The two brief words I hear,
While west the moon doth sail.
"Good night! Alas we part!"
"Good night! O dearest heart!"

"Good night!" The moon does wane;
More purple grows the sky,
And duskier the plain
Where sleeping farmsteads lie.
"Good night! and dreams of peace
Till darkness have surcease!"

Ah, long have gone their way
Fair Venus and red Mars;
Yet for us shine for aye
Love's everlasting stars!
So, whilst time taketh flight,
"Good night!"—and then "Good night!"
—William Struthers in Boston Transcript.

Ministered to His Enjoyment.

"Tommy, for the land's sake, where have you been for the last two hours?"

"Been havin' a good time with an automobile."

"You don't mean to say you've been taking a ride in one?"

"Naw! Standin' off an' hollerin' 'get a horse!' at a feller that was tryin' to make a busted machine go." —Chicago Tribune.

They Knew the Answer.

"You never can tell how children are going to apply things," said a public school teacher.

"The other day I asked the class what a fort was. One boy answered, 'A place to put men in.'

"'Then what's a fortress?' said I.

"'A place to put women in!' exclaimed the class in unison."

LITTLE EDITOR IN DILEMMA.

Identity of His Visitor Was a Real Puzzle.

A well-known New York publisher has the entrance to his private office guarded by one of his editors, a small man, who, as the day wears on, sinks down in a little heap in his high-backed chair under the weight of the manuscripts he has to read. The publisher was exceedingly proud of his friendship with the late Thomas B. Reed, who usually called when he was in New York.

One day the huge form of the speaker of the House of Representatives loomed up before the little editor, with the evident intent of bearing down upon the private office.

"Back!" shouted the little editor, waving a slender arm with much vigor. "Back! Go back to the offith and thend in your card."

Mr. Reed paused, inclined his head to view the obstacle that opposed his progress and smiled. Then he ponderously turned on his heel and did as he was directed.

Of course, the published bustled out personally to conduct the great man into the private office. When his visitor had departed the publisher came forth in a rage. The little editor shriveled before him as he began:

"You confounded idiot, what do you mean by holding up Tom Reed in this fashion? Don't you know he is one of my oldest friends? Don't you know he's at perfect liberty to walk into my office at any time without as much as knocking?"

"Yeth," admitted the little editor feebly.

"You do? Then what do you mean by holding him up and subjecting him to such discourtesy?"

"I thought he wath Dr. John Hall."

"Dr. John Hall!" exclaimed the exasperated publisher. "Dr. John Hall! Don't you know that Dr. John Hall is dead?"

"Yeth," returned the little editor with earnest sincerity. "That'th what bothered me."

Carries His Own Glass.

"Give me a glass of orange phosphate," said the red-faced man.

Then he took a tall, thin glass from his coat pocket and passed it over to the clerk.

"What's that for?" asked the clerk.

"To put the phosphate in," said the man. "I can't drink out of your glasses. I sat in a place once where I could see you fellows dabble your spoons and glasses in that little pool under the counter. That was enough for me. Since then, when I go out for a soda or phosphate, I take my own glass along. You needn't be afraid of it. It is regulation size. It won't hold a drop more than your own glasses. The only difference is it is clean. Hurry up, please."

The clerk seemed in doubt, but he mixed the phosphate. The fastidious man sipped it with appreciative smacks and glared contemptuously the while upon the common herd who took their refreshments from drug store glasses.

Of Course He Did.

Jimmy (the Chicago kid, visiting his cousin Erasmus of Boston)—Say, Rassy, did you ever play hookey from school to go in swimmin' an' git licked when you got home? Gee! ain't it fun?

Erasmus—If you mean occasionally willfully absenting myself from the institute of learning without the cognizance of my preceptor or my paternal guardians, and seeking the shady pool to indulge in natatorial evolutions, with the resultant chastisement on my return to the parental roof, I am ready to admit that I have indulged myself therein, James, much to my enjoyment, notwithstanding that the act was a reprehensible lapse from duty.—Browning's Magazine.

Surprise for "Si" Shurtleff.

To Josiah Shurtleff, who, among his friends, is known as "Si," came the following interesting but embarrassing experience:

It was during the first term of Mr. Shurtleff's service on the Revere school board, and the occasion was his visit to a first grade in a primary school. The teacher was hearing a reading class. The first sentence of the lesson was as follows: "Oh, fie, what a sly boy you are!"

Turning to one small boy, who seemed eager, she said: "Daniel, you may read."

Whereupon the lad, in a piping voice, read this somewhat startling statement: "Oh, Si, what a fly boy you are!"—Boston Herald.

Ruth.

She stood breast high amid the corn
Clasped by the golden light of morn
Like the sweetheart of the sun,
Who many a glowing kiss had won.

On her cheek an autumn flush,
Deeply ripen'd—such a blush
In the midst of brown was born,
Like red poppies grown with corn.

Round her eyes her tresses fell,
Which were blackest none could tell,
But long lashes veil'd a light,
That had else been all too bright.

And her hat with shady brim,
Made her tressy forehead dim—
Thus she stood among the stooks,
Praising God with sweetest looks.

Sure I said, Heaven did not mean,
Where I reap, thou should'st but glean,
Lay thy sheaf adown and come,
Share my harvest and my home.
—Tom Hood.

Dressed for the Burglars.

The late Cephas Brigham, the Boston lawyer, was very moderate in speech and movement. The following story used to be told of him as an illustration:

"Mrs. Brigham awoke him one night, saying she thought there were burglars in the house. He got up, dressed himself, even to collar and necktie, and, turning to his wife, said: "Mrs. Brigham — in—which—direction—do—you—suppose—the— robbers—are?"

Various Kinds of Ivory

Enormous Amount Is Exported from Africa Yearly for Use in Europe—Large Deposits of Mammoth Tusks.

Ivory is, strictly speaking, obtained only from the tusks of the elephant, the finest of which comes from the coast of Africa. This hard, heavy, fine-grained green or guinea ivory is esteemed for its transparency, and because its light yellow or pale blood tint, unlike the whiteness of other kinds which becomes yellow, bleaches with age. The different species of African elephant supply almost all the ivory used in Europe. Its quantity is enormous. The British importation 1900 was 1,175,000 pounds, which represent 60,000 tusks. One London firm sells 10,000 tusks yearly in billiard balls. Under so heavy a drain the supply must fail, but to fall back upon are remarkable deposits of mammoth tusks which have accumulated on the rivers discharging into the Arctic ocean.

Since man began to express himself in art he has made use of ivory. Here, however, the term has a wider application. It covers the teeth of the hippopotamus, the long tusks of the walrus, and even the single tooth or the narwhale. Under the description of ivories come carving in polished stag's-horn and in bone. The most remarkable of prehistoric ivories is the representation of a head and shoulder of an ibex carved in reindeer horn, which is done with so much science and observation, though the work of a cave-dweller of Dordogne, that naturalists are able to assign it to the ibex of the Alps rather than that of the Pyrenees.

Billiard balls are turned from the most perfect elephant tusks; not necessarily the largest, for the best and most costly are made from teeth scarcely larger than the balls themselves in diameter, and known as ball teeth. Some of the balls turned from even these are better than others. They are of higher grade the nearer they are to the termination of the nerve which runs through the tusk, and the smaller this is, as may be observed in the black speck to be seen on a ball, the better the quality.

Fossil or blue ivory is sometimes found in commerce, and is used occasionally in the manufacture of jewelry. It is evidently from the tusks of antediluvian mammoths buried in the earth for thousands of years, during which time they have become slowly penetrated with metallic salts, which have given them a peculiar blue color, allowing them to be used as turquoises.

Silly Old English Custom

Example of the Follies That Prevailed During the Reign of Charles II—Sir Charles Sedley's Grim Joke.

Amongst other follies of the days of Charles II., it was the custom when a gentleman drank a lady's health as a toast, by way of doing her greater honor, to throw some part of his dress into the fire, an example which his friends were bound to follow by consuming the same article of their apparel, whatever it might be.

One of his friends, perceiving at a tavern dinner that Sir Charles Sedley had on a very rich lace cravat when he named his toast, committed his cravat to the flames as a burnt offering to the temporary divinity, and Sir Charles and the rest of the party were obliged to do the same. The poet bore his loss with great composure, observing it was a good joke, but that he would have as good a one some other time.

He watched, therefore, his opportunity when the same party was assembled on a subsequent occasion, and drinking off a bumper to the health of Nell Gwynne, or some other beauty of the day, he called the waiter, and ordering a tooth-drawer into the room, whom he had previously brought to the tavern for the purpose, made him draw a decayed tooth, which long had plagued him. The rules of good-fellowship, as then in force, clearly required that every one of the company should have a tooth drawn also, but they very naturally expressed a hope that Sedley would not be so unmerciful as to enforce the law. Deaf, however, to all their remonstrances, persuasions and entreaties, he saw them, one after another, put themselves into the hands of the operator, and whilst writhing with pain, added to their torments by exclaiming:

"Patience, gentlemen, patience; you know you promised that I should have my frolic, too."

Prime Causes of Suicide

Avoidance of Physical Labor, It Is Declared, Is a Large Factor in Shaping Conduct of Those Who Are Tired of Life.

Throughout the literature of suicide one will find that the attitude toward wage-earning and work is a larger factor in shaping motives. The dread of being forced to work after a period of leisure, the mad desire to get money by trickery and gambling devices, the scorn with which manual labor is regarded by the "successful," is emphasized by the stories of the newly rich become suddenly poor, and who then deftly escape into the unknown and live on pensions and polite beggary.

But nothing is surer than that work is the primal condition of health and the love of life. It is the do-nothing, the fashionable, the "retired," the woman freed from necessities and duties, that are the disease-breeders and the miserables. The attitude of the fashionable doctors who minister to this unspeakable class is not infrequently blameworthy. They are often encouraged by our rest cures, our flatteries and attentions.

The effort to escape from drudgery is as old as civilization and as ancient as savagery. The investigator sent to study the problem of putting the native African negroes to useful work finds that they simply will not work. Those among the Canadian Doukhobors who would work found that the maligners and lazies were about half, and they preferred to live out of the common treasury supplied by the workers—until the latter determined to abolish the common treasury and to receive and spend their own wages as other individuals do.

Our civilization, economically, is largely a device of the cunning and the lazy to establish a common treasury. The "failure of democracy" is largely the failure to outwit the tricksters.—American Medicine.

Young Doctor's Bad Break

Imitation of the Manners and Methods of His More Experienced Friend Got Youth Into Most Serious Trouble.

Mary A. Livermore was fond of telling the following story:

Years ago, when the members of the medical profession were not so numerous as now, there lived in one of the suburbs near Boston a physician who had a large practice. Dr. X. finally hired a younger and less experienced man to help him and look out for the less serious cases. The younger man was still a student, and was the companion of Dr. X.

One day the elder of the two turned to his subordinate and said: "Henry, you had better come with me to-morrow. I've got to visit old Mrs. Marshall, and if you get a call from her later in the week you'll know what to do."

So together they visited the patient, a sufferer from intestinal trouble.

"Very sick lady, I should say," said Dr. X., catching her wrist. What have you been eating lately—lobster, eh!"

"But how in the world could you know?" asked the lady in surprise.

"Why, by the shells at the bedside. Stop all food of that description, and change the diet. Take this medicine three times daily."

Both doctors then left, and the younger man was the next day alone when a call came for Dr. X. The young man responded. He went into the sick room and took the pulse of the patient, a man.

"Very sick, indeed," said Dr. Henry, with a professional air. "What have you been eating? Ah! too much horse!"

"Horse! Horse!" cried the patient; "what do you mean?"

"I saw the harness on the floor! You'd better change your diet."

"Get out of my house!" cried the old man in a rage. "I sent for a doctor, not a fool!"

Allegory of the Washtub

"I Saw a Woman Washing the Graveclothes of the Dead"—She Washed Them With Her Tears.

The woman of the washtub,
She works till fall of night;
With soap and suds and soda
Her hands are wrinkled white.
Her diamonds are the sparkles
The copper fire supplies;
Her opals are the bubbles
That from the suds arise.

The woman of the washtub
Has lost the charm of youth;
Her hair is rough and homely,
Her figure is uncouth;
Her temper is like thunder,
With no one she agrees—
The children of the alley
They cling around her knees.

The woman of the washtub,
She, too, had her romance;
There was a time when lightly
Her feet flew in the dance.
Her feet were silver swallows,
Her lips were flowers of fire;
Then she was bright and early,
The blossom of desire.

O woman at the washtub,
And do you ever dream
Of all your days gone by in
Your aureole of steam?
From birth till we are dying
You wash your sordid duds,
O woman of the washtub!
O sister of the suds!

One night I saw a vision
That filled my soul with dread—
I saw a woman washing
The grave clothes of the dead.
The dead were all the living,
And dry were lakes and meres;
The woman at the washtub,
She washed them with her tears.

I saw a line with banners
Hung forth in proud array—
The banners of all battles
From Cain to judgment day;
And they were stiff with slaughter
And blood from hem to hem,
And they were red with glory,
And she was washing them.

THE F. E. & C. U. OF A.

"We are delighted to note the space The Union is devoting to the union. We feel that this paper should be well supported by the farmers of Chilton county." The above is from the Union Educator, published at Guin, Ala., and we thank the brother for his kind appreciation of our efforts for the farmers of Chilton. We have in the past, and will in the future, do all in our power to forward the best interests of our farmers, who are the mainstay of our country. Chilton is not as rich or so thickly populated as many other counties in our State, but she has earned the name of being at the front in all movements that have for their object the bettering of the condition of the farmers and humanity in general. Fall in line, boys, and help us all you can in this good work.

J. W. Sorrell, representing Chilton county on the Executive Committee of the Farmers' Union, attended the meeting at Birmingham on the 20th inst. and reports as follows: Elected T. F. Parker, of Bodine, as State business agent and fixed his bond. Accepted State Secretary Cook's bond. Passed a resolution recommending "that the members of the union throughout this State buy their flour in Cotton sacks," as they get the flour cheaper in that form, and our good mothers and wives can use the sacks after they are emptied. The State Union is to be held the first Wednesday in March, 1906, at the town offering the best accommodations, etc.

THE BIRMINGHAM TIMES.

Since the death of H. A. Wilson, The Times has passed into the hands of J. D. Bingham, who has changed its appearance very decidedly for the better and who says that he intends giving the Republicans of Alabama an up-to-date weekly paper that will "do them proud." So mote it be. We wish Bro. Bingham and The Times all the success which they will merit by their "works."

COTTON PICKERS.

Some people talk about machines to pick cotton, but so far have failed to produce a successful article. However, the loss will not be badly felt as long as we have among us such fast pickers as live in Collins chapel community. On September 21, on J. W. Collins' place, T. K. Littleton picked 418 pounds, his wife 332, S. P. Collins 354, his wife 350, T. J. Collins, Jr., 354, and the Misses Lucy, Mary and Lizzie Collins 250, 250 and 196 pounds, respectively, making in all 2,504 pounds of cotton picked in 11 hours.

J. D. Collins writes us that he picked 1,329 pounds in four days, the largest single day being 405 pounds. If any community can beat the above record, let them trot out their figures

BEAT 9 GLEANINGS.

Cotton picking is all the go. D. H. Gentry made a trip to Calera last week. I. H. Gentry spent several days last week in Tuscaloosa Co., looking for timber. He is one of our hustling saw mill men. Miss Ada Collins of Calera, was buried at New Salem cemetery Thursday, a large number of relatives and friends being in attendance. Every one that knew her mourns her loss, and sympathize with the bereaved family. R. W. Scott was in Clanton Saturday. Wm. Pierce, one of our enterprising farmers, was in Clanton Sunday. The brethren of Liberty Hill church baptized 11 converts at the New Salem baptizing grounds Sunday at 3 p. m. Rev. Joe Gibson filled his regular appointment at Cedar Grove Sunday. Mrs. Wash Foshee and Mrs. Enoch Foshee were visitors at Mr. A. F. Mims' Sunday. A. J. Allen and sisters, Misses Renie and Barbara, visited C. F. Wilson's Sunday. Cotton is 10.37 in Thorsby and I've got two bales or more to pick, so will ring off.

NIM ROD.

MARBURY.

Louis Heath was killed near his home Friday evening. Walter Slayton shot him twice with a double-barreled shotgun, and he lived only a few minutes. He leaves a widow and five children. The cause of the trouble is unknown. No arrests have been made.

VISITOR.

ENERGY.

Mr. Editor:

Here I come again, though not much is doing in this neck of the woods. Wasn't that a rousing meeting that the Republicans held at Thorsby? By the way, they've got some of the best men in our county on that committee, and it's not a bit too soon, as "politics" is warming up just a little, and it's causing the democrats to fear and tremble. I'll tell you, Mr. Editor, they think they've found the sound democrat the banner man spoke of some time since. Behold, he is coming like a cloud in summer. Great cream-colored thunder heads are lifting above the sharp, clear line of the western horizon; the light breeze dies away and the air becomes stifling. The white-capped clouds roll up nearer and nearer to the sun and the creamy masses below grow dark in their seams; the muttering that came faintly before now spreads into wide volume of rolling sound that echoes again and again from the eastern heights. "He is a sound, sound democrat?" Long chains of lightning flash and the growling thunder seems like the rumble of a campaign; the air freshens and I see this man, and I'll go sixteen to one that if a "sound democrat?" could get elected to the legislature from this county, that he would make laws as straight as the political career of the banner man. Now, my friendly readers, I'm like "Just a Voter," I must have an office the next time you have one to give out. I'm not particular what kind of an office it is, but I'm coming in somewhere; don't you forget it.

"RED-HEADED BOY."

THORSBY LETTER.

Public school opened on Wednesday last with an attendance of about 60. The teachers are Miss Denman, of Jacksonville, and Miss Fay and Miss Gallagher, of Montgomery. As soon as the cotton picking seasen is over many more children will enter the school. Mr. Moore, our county superintendent, was in town last week. He addressed the children at the opening of the school.

Mrs. Wishart has returned to Birmingham with her stock of millinery. We regret that she has left Thorsby. Miss Ida Collins, of Calera, who died of consumption on Thursday last, was buried at Salem church on Friday morning. Mr. Edward O'Grady, who has been visiting in Chicago, Michigan and Colorado, has returned to Thorsby. Mrs. Michelson is visiting friends and relatives in Chicago. Mr. Michelson has gone to Chicago on business. Our boys were badly beaten in the ball game with the Clanton boys on last Saturday. Our boys need to practice more. The Sunshine Society met with Miss Lida Neal on Wednesday. The meeting was held in Engh's pine grove. Mrs. Gerald entertained the Norwegian Ladies' Aid Society last week. Miss Maud Gerald, who has been visiting in the north for several months, is on her way to Portland, Oregon, where she will attend the Lewis and Clark Exposition. Our new gin at Thorsby is doing good work.

CHATTERBOX.

RANDOLPH.

Cotton is pouring in, the old crop as well as the new. J. Calhoun Woolley, of Lawley, was in town Monday. Mr. Frank Martin lost his dwelling house and outbuildings by fire Thursday night. The fire started in the lot buildings. He saved his household goods. The cause of the fire is unknown. J. D. Glasscock, one of the true reformers of beat 3, was a visitor Saturday. B. V. Washburne was in town Monday. We were pleased to notice in The Union of recent date that our friend, L. P. Martin, of Thorsby, had secured a marriage license. We extend to him our best wishes in his new sphere of life. Yes, Leonard, we sometimes smile to think of our pleasant associations during last December. The fourth Sunday in September is past. Ah, we know many of the older people in Chilton will look upon that day as a sweet reminder of the annual meeting time of Mulberry Baptist Association in the sweet long ago, when such vast crowds of people would assemble once each year at New Salem, Providence, Center Hill, Macedonia and other places, where such men as Hobson, Langston, Honeycutt, Hill, Allen and others were leaders, where the kind mothers in Israel provided rich and bountiful dinners, where doubtless many who were then young spent happy hours laying plans for the future who have grown old, and others have been separated by the changes in life who could adopt the language of Moore and say, "Those joyous hours are passed away, and many a heart that then was gay, within the tomb now darkly dwells and hears no more the evening bells." These anniversaries carry our thoughts back to the sweet scenes of yore. Health and happiness to The Union and its readers.

"ONE OF THE BOYS."

CENTER HILL.

Editor Union:

As it looks now, our cotton will soon be gathered. Some farmers are selling as fast as they get it out, while others are hauling it home and waiting for 11 cents or better. Cotton is always worth 10 cents, and when our farmers get that for their crop and also have their smokehouses and corn cribs full of their own raising they can live at home and board at the same place in solid comfort. J. N. Scott went to his brother's O. P. Scott, who resides near Parkwood, to attend meeting. Our singing choir went on the third Sunday to Shady Grove and had an all day singing, except for a fine sermon preached by Rev. J. E. Champion. All enjoyed the day, and especially the nice dinner. Our F. E. & C. U. of A. is progressing nicely, but we hope the people will get more fully interested in it. I like James Franklin's ideas on school taxation, and long for the time when we'll have our schools for eight or ten months and no supplement. And if any man will not send his children to school the law should compel him to do so. I'll venture to say that there isn't a man in Chilton that can't give his children a common school education, and there are many that can do better. But, some say, my children have a better chance than I had. Well, they should have, and any man should see to it that they did have a better chance than the majority of us fathers did. Our school opens the second Monday in October. Prof. J. H. Anderson will teach for us. We've had him before, and hope he'll have a grand success this time. Watch out, Judge, some one is going over the big hill every Sunday, and he'll soon want a license.

DAD'S PLOW BOY.

UNION GROVE.

Cotton picking is all the go in this part of the country, and if the weather holds favorable all will be gathered and stored away for 11 and 12 cents at least. Hold your cotton, farmers, and we'll sure get our price. We're glad to see the people of our community so interested in a school building, and we hope to see a two-story building go up in the near future. Hurrah for the Farmers' Union! Isn't it grand? We are organized at Union and are proud of it. It is certainly a grand thing for the farmer and each and every one of us ought to be a member. Well, cotton picking don't seem to affect baseball much. Union and Collins Chapel crossed bats on our grounds Saturday. Score, 40 to 5 in favor of Union. Hurrah for Union, The Union and Farmers' Union.

FOX HUNTER.

NOTICE.

The Chilton county branch of the Southern Cotton Association will meet at the court house in Clanton on Saturday, October 7, 1905. We earnestly solicit the attendance of all persons interested in cotton, whether they are members of the association or not.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is hit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

ONE ON THE HOLD-UP MAN.

Said this person: 'No wonder I bubble
With mirth and with merriment double.
Why he robbed me as well as a first-class hotel,
But I gave no tip for his trouble!"
—Life.

THEN HE RAN.

Huskey—My weight is exactly 231 pounds.

Littleton—With all your clothes on, of course.

Huskey—No, sir! That's my net weight.

Littleton—Net? Hum. Most people would call that gross.—Philadelphia Press.

BUT HE MUST BE MUZZLED.

"Will a lonely dog follow you?" asked a college professor testing his students. A lonely dog will follow anybody; the real test is, will a dog that is not lonely make friends with you? If he will, there is hope for you.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

WHAT SHE REALLY WANTED.

Applicant—I called to see you with regard to your advertisement in today's paper under the head of "Help Wanted."

Mrs Homer—That was a typographical error. I want a girl to do all the work, not to help.—Columbus Dispatch.

WHY HE KNEW IT.

"Do you know," said the Sunday-school teacher, addressing a new pupil in the infant class, "that you have a soul. "Course I do," replied the little fellow, placing his hand over his heart, "I can feel it tick.— Moberly (Mo.) Monitor.

A PURIST.

Mr. Bosting—I passed a disagreeable half hour just now with two footpads.

Mrs. Bosting—Mercy me! were you alone at the time?

Mr. Bosting—My dear, had I been alone there would have been no footpads.

BUT THE SENSATION WAS AGREEABLE.

The Rev. Mr. Snow—You married that couple at the Toplofty apartment house the other evening, did you not? The papers spoke of it as one of the most sensational weddings of the season.

The Rev. Dr. Fourthly—In one respect it was the most sensational wedding I ever knew. The bridegroom gave me a $100 fee.—Chicago Tribune.

LONG AND SHORT OF IT..

Stranger—Is the cashier of the local bank a tall man?

Native—Physically speaking, yes.

Stranger—Physically speaking!

Native—Yes; otherwise he is short—something like $50,000. That's why he has taken a trip abroad.—Chicago News.

OMISSIONS OF HISTORY.

Lord Cornwallis had surrendered at Yorktown.

"I decided it was the best thing to do," he explained to the reporters. It's a great cheaper, all around, than it would be for the two countries to hold a peace conference. Think of the cable tolls!"

Besides, as he reflected afterwards, it didn't bind King George to the payment of an indemnity. — Chicago News.

ONE THING NEEDFUL.

The postman had just handed in a robust envelope.

"I wish," said the poet's wife, "that we could borrow a savage dog somewhere."

"What for?' queried the verse carpenter.

"To keep the wolf from the door," answered his better half, with a sigh long drawn out.—Detroit Tribune.

HE WAS A WAITER.

Myer (entering cafe) Hello, Gyer! I hear you quit your job in the bank. What are you doing now?

Gyer (seated at table)—I'm a waiter in this restaurant.

Myer—Is it possible.

Gyer—Yes; I'm waiting for my dinner.—Detroit Tribune.

HOW IT HAPPENED.

Anxious Mother—Do you mean to say that you permitted Mr. Huggins to put his arm about your waist of your own free will?

Pretty Daughter—No, indeed, mamma. Considerable pressure was brought to bear upon me, I assure you.—Columbus Dispatch.

A SLAP AT HER.

"Our children," said Mrs. Cassidy, whose husband had come in for some money, "will spend the summer in the country, away from the hate av the city."

"Yis" replied the jealous Mrs. Casey. "Faith, the Country Wake Association is a great charity, so it is."

The county commissioners met on the 21st and rejected all the bids for the work on the addition to the court house and raising the jail on account of the price being too high, and are going to advertise again. By the way, how about the examination of the county officials' books as relating to the county? Many other counties in our state have had these examinations made with the result of adding to the county funds.

PAUPERS IN KNIFE DUEL.

Bloody Fight to Death Stopped by Keeper.

Somerville, N. J.—The Bridgewater Township poorhouse was the scene of a bloody duel with knives between George Potter and Edward Riley, two inmates of the institution. The men started to fight, but were separated by the keeper. Later they agreed to settle their difference in a duel with knives, in which they were to fight to the death in the presence of a number of their fellow inmates. They started the fight in a secluded spot, where they were not observed by the keeper, and began literally to cut each other to pieces.

The sight horrified the spectators, who hurriedly summoned the keeper, David Dunn. Both men were terribly slashed about the face and body. Potter, one of the combatants, is eighty years old.

By Charles Edward Jerningham, the Distinguished English Journalist and Wit.

THE mechanical peril is a difficulty which has not escaped the attention of the present parliament. The special commission which was recently appointed to inquire into the matter has issued an interim report, and the following evidence of one of the witnesses examined is of especial interest:

Q. Can you write? A. No; I use a typewriter.

Q. Can you sing? No; I use a phonograph.

Q. Can you form an independent political, literary artistic, or ordinary opinion? A. No; I belong to an "organized" political party and take my opinions in this direction from the wirepullers. As regards literature and art, I receive my impressions of those matters from the reviews in the newspapers, and in ordinary circumstances I follow general public opinion.

Q. Can you breathe? A. No; I use artificial respiration.

From these answers it would appear that the man of the immediate future will be entirely dependent upon mechanical contrivances, organizations and medical resources; that he will only have emerged from one form of slavery after generations of struggling, to enter into another which is more abominable. Take away from the man of 2005 his typewriter, phonograph, pianola, bath, bicycle, motor-car, train, sewing-machine, spectacles, digestives, narcotics and newspapers and he will be an utterly helpless creature.—London Truth.

THE STIRRUP-CUP.

My short and happy day is done,
The long and dreary night comes on;
And at my door the pale horse stands
To carry me to unknown lands.

His whinny shrill, his pawing hoof,
Sound dreadful as a gathering storm;
And I must leave this sheltering roof
And joys of life so soft and warm.

Tender and warm the joys of life—
Good friends, the faithful and the true—
My rosy children and my wife,
So sweet to kiss, so fair to view.

So sweet to kiss, so fair to view;
The night comes down, the lights burn blue;
And at my door the pale horse stands
To bear me forth to unknown lands.

Major Couryn's Victory.

By Amanda M. Douglas.

Now that Major Couryn was recovering, he had time to look about and take some interest in his sister's household. It consisted of a widow, two little girls and a governess, besides the servants. He was not extravagantly fond of children, and Mrs. Anthon was one of those domestic, motherly women who seem especially designed by Providence for the care of children.

After people reached maturity they were as much beyond her comprehension as a Greek tragedy in the original. Not that she was cold or blindly obtuse, but it was a subject quite above her comprehension, so she never worried herself. For all that, she and the major had been the best of friends, unlike as they were. And he had felt that if he could once come home to Emmie's kind care, he should get well. So here he was when the doctors had agreed, one and all, that he hadn't three month's lease of life.

"You will not go back to the army?" Emily said, pleadingly, one day. "You've tramped around forts and frontiers, and done you duty by your country, I'm sure. Then you're old enough to——"

There Mrs. Anthon made a long pause.

"Be president, commander, or what?" and Couryn laughed. His natural gayety was coming back to him.

"Oh, I never think of those things. You ought to be married, Horace."

He gave a prolonged whistle.

"You want me steadied down—burdened with the cares of life!"

"You certainly can afford to marry and you're old enough—thirty five; and you've been in the army fifteen years."

"I learned both to obey and command. Well, whom shall I marry?"

Mrs. Anthon colored a little.

"The first day you feel equal to the exertion I want to take you for a call on the Weirs. There are two young ladies, pretty, well educated, sensible and ladylike; not poor by any means, and I like them both. I'm not much in favor of made marriages, but you can see them at least."

"I suppose they're not cannibals enough to eat me," and Couryn gave another little laugh.

"I'd like to have you married and settled here. There's the homestead rented out year after year, and you forever away. Why not begin to enjoy life?"

Major Couryn thought it over, lying there on the lounge by the open window, that cool, fragrant, June afternoon. The breath of roses and honeysuckle was everywhere, and the smooth-shaven lawn, with its clusters of evergreens, formed a pleasant picture. Hadn't he rambled around long enough, toiled and borne hardships, and nearly wrecked his health? What more could his country ask of him in time of comparative peace. Home and indolence were rather enjoyable, after all. And most men married some time. He had flirted desperately several times, and been a general admirer of the sex. If a girl was pretty, refined, accomplished and all that, would it be so very hard to love her? Emily was a very straightforward, prosaic body, but her judgment was excellent, and her taste unusually good.

A shadow crossed the lawn and his vision at the same time. This was Mrs. Vaughan, his sister's governess—a rather haughty, reticent woman, who filled her position admirably, and took no liberties with any one. Up to this time he could have told but two facts concerning her—that she was tall, and wore black. The mourning was for her husband doubtless. He looked at her figure, a certain elasticity even in those sauntering steps. She turned her face to check Isabel in some rather noisy romp, and then lost herself in thought. Rich, dark, abundant hair, deep, shadowy eyes and a clear, colorless complexion. At that moment he thought her a very handsome woman, but, as he said to himself, proud as Lucifer. And, somehow, the very pride appeared tempting to him. He had been in such a miserable, weakly way for so long that he was quite anxious to try his strength and face an enemy once more.

"It's too bad to be compelled to leave you this evening," Mrs. Anthon said, just at dusk; "but I really must go to the rectory tonight. I've declined several invitations lately, and now you're so much better; but, then, you'll feel the more lonesome."

"Never mind about me."

"Horace, if you would like Mrs. Vaughan to come in and read to you—" Mrs. Anthon went on, rather doubtfully, to be sure, but anxious for his comfort. "She used to read to me nearly every evening last winter. I think you'd enjoy it."

"Well, if Mrs. Vaughan doesn't object," was his slow reply, but his brain was not as tranquil as his voice.

Mrs. Vaughan assented immediately to Mrs. Anthon's requests, because that lady was never unreasonable.

She was ushered into Major Couryn's sitting room in the most dignified manner, and replied to his remark with a haughty graciousness that would not have shamed a queen.

Major Couryn smiled under his mustache, stretched himself into a position of comfortable laziness, and listened.

She was an effective reader, and had her voice under perfect control—her face, too, for that matter. Though she gave sentiment and pathos their due, her features wore their grave composure.

"I wish you'd get that volume of Tennyson," he said, presently, "and read some of the songs out of the 'Princess.' I haven't outgrown my boyish love for his mellow sweetness, though I'm old enough to leave it far behind."

She turned her eyes sharply upon him at this.

"You question the soundness and maturity of my taste," he said, with a curious smile.

"I didn't question anything, Major Couryn."

Her voice was as cool as the sound of dropping rain.

"It isn't always necessary to express what one thinks in words. Faces speak as well."

"I was not aware that mine did," she returned, haughtily.

Then she opened the book and read in her coldest, calmest manner.

He wanted to talk, so he cast about for some pretext. He could be quite irresistible when he chose, and the languor left by a long illness was very much in his favor.

In spite of herself Mrs. Vaughan was drawn into conversation. At first it was very wary skirmishing on both sides, but his effort was not made for nothing.

"What do you know about Mrs. Vaughan?" he asked of his sister the next morning.

"Very little. She taught two years in a school before she was married After she lost her husband she was thrown upon her own exertions again. I have a fancy that he wasn't very successful in business, for she gave music lessons while he was alive."

Major Couryn decided that there was a good deal to her, and some way he meant to make her display the richness of her soul for his repast. He was improving very rapidly, and that afternoon sat on the lawn with the children, taking an active share in their amusements. Mrs. Vaughan watched him curiously. By a subtle intuition she knew that she was the cause of his being there. She was not a vain woman, yet, in spite of her outward placidity, her pulse started up in tumult now and then.

"Suppose we drive over to the Weirs?" Mrs. Anthon said, rejoining them. "You have not had you usual exercise today."

"Very well;" and Major Couryn rose.

"I shall append a 'to be continued' to that conversation," he said, in passing her; then their eyes met for an instant.

During the next half hour Grace and Isabel indulged in some unwarranted freaks, unchecked by the governess. Then she suddenly came back to herself. What a fool she had been! Major Couryn was used to such pastime, doubtless.

Major Couryn, in the meanwhile, was taken to a rather imposing mansion and introduced to the daughters of the house. They certainly merited his sister's praise, but their calm, fair faces stirred no feeling of emotion or interest within his brain.

"Ellen is the handsomer, but Carrie has such a lovely sweet voice. Didn't you think so?" his sister asked, for they had been singing.

"Yes, it is very fine," he said, absently.

"I think Ellen is my favorite. She's just past twenty, which is a very interesting age."

He assented again.

"Horace," Mrs. Anthon said, presently, "you're not a bit interested.

"Am I not? I was thinking of marrying."

"Do you really mean it?"

"If I can find any one to have me."

"We will invite Ellen over here," she said, pleased to find what she had considered indifference was grave earnest.

But his thoughts were upon another woman. He found many opportunities to see Mrs. Vaughan, and, the ice once broken, it was a hard matter for her to intrench herself again. From courtesy they went to skirmishing, from commonplaces they proceeded to odd, piquant talks. And, though Major Couryn never seemed on the watch, yet he always appeared when she was alone.

What did it mean? she asked herself. When she decided that it was mere trifling, and held herself haughtily aloof, he always found the royal path to her heart, and subdued her to his will. For a few moments she dared to be happy, but was it at all likely he intended to marry her? And why not? Was she not as estimable as more fortunate women on whom fate had smiled?

She was not long in understanding Mrs. Anthon's plans. Miss Weir was in constant demand, and Major Couryn was fully as polite as society required. She was very fond of riding, and, as soon as he could take to his saddle, the two rode nearly every day. She used to watch them, generally in the morning. He certainly was growing handsome with returning health. A faint color was stealing into his cheeks, and the deathly paleness was giving place to a more becoming hue, and in place of the languor of a kind of jaunty energy that said there was much strength in reserve.

Maud Vaughan looked over her barren past life. One brief love dream rudely dispelled, hardship, toil, secret dissatisfaction, and a dreary future stretching out before her. More than once she had been tempted to try the stage. The life always appeared distasteful to her until one gained an advanced position, and then—she had no friend to give her a helping hand or intercede for her. In spite of pride and energy, she was not one of those women who could push on in the face of obstacles.

One cool summer evening she sat in the library, rehearsing some scenes from Shakespeare. Mrs. Anthon and the children had been out all day, and she was not aware that she had an auditor until a sort of half-suppressed breath startled her and made her turn her eyes toward the door. There stood Major Couryn!

"Excellently well done, Mrs. Vaughan," he said, glancing at her, while the scarlet blood mounted to cheek and brow.

"I was simply reading for my own amusement," she said, angry at his intrusion.

"You offer yourself a very high order of entertainment. Will you go on while I listen?"

"Excuse me," she returned, haughtily, closing her book.

"I believe I shall complain of your treatment. You are not as indulgent as you used to be."

"And you are able to choose your own pleasures."

"Not always, it seems," he said, pointedly. "Are you practicing for the stage?"

A spirit of recklessness came over her, and, rising to her full height, she said:

"I have thought of it occasionally."

How handsome she looked standing proudly there, flushed and sparkling. All the fervor of his soul seemed to concentrate then and become love. To have others gaze upon and applaud this beauty when he might possess it! No, it should never be!

"I wish you would think of something more appropriate for women—love and marriage.

"That would be folly for me."

She was quiet enough now, though her breath came in gasps.

"And why folly? It may be daring to say this, but I love you!"

"How long since, Major Couryn? Yesterday you were Ellen Weir's adorer."

An exultant smile crossed his lips. She was not as insensible then as he had feared. Jealousy was the best ally for love.

"Was I? Are you so versed in the minute shades of regard that you can tell accurately?"

"Major Couryn," she said, "you are a man of the world, used to the many caprices of society that mean nothing. Women in my position are often considered fair amusement, but I am not to be trifled with. Miss Weir is your equal and the admired friend of your sister—"

"And you would advise me to marry her?"

Mrs. Vaughan was exasperated by his coolness.

"As you like," she returned, haughtily. "It is quite useless to repeat these meaningless words to me."

He took two or three rapid turns across the room. He had not expected to find her quite so thorny, and for a moment he paused, uncertain how to proceed.

"Quite useless?" he repeated slowly, looking at her.

There was an almost imperceptible lowering of the eyes and a faint quiver of the lips. How much was at stake? Should she make any concession?

It was not Maud Vaughan's nature to do that. Once she had been miserably deceived, and she would not be willfully blind now.

"Major Couryn, this is child's play," she said, sweeping slowly, but loftily, from the room.

He made no motion to detain her. When alone she buried her proud face in her hands and wept a few bitter tears. Could she have had this man's love? Why, it would have been a new life to her! What did all that lay between matter? If fortune had been hers, she would gladly have shared it with him. If power had been hers, she would give her very life to make him happy. And yet she had considered his words trifling and meaningless.

She was pale the next morning, and a dark tint under her eyes showed that her slumbers had not been very profound. He watched her narrowly, quite satisfied that her thoughts had been of him.

Left to herself, Mrs. Vaughan set about making new resolves. Major Couryn had determined to repair the old homestead and take possession, and Mrs. Anthon was all interest. Of course he would marry. And then Maud Vaughan knew that she could not endure to remain. It would be no place for her, to look upon their happiness. Did Ellen Weir plume herself upon her anticipated good fortune?

"Mrs. Vaughan is going away," Mrs. Anthon announced in great distress. "She wanted to leave immediately, but I persuaded her to stay until the first of September. I don't know what I shall do. I shall never like anyone so well again."

Major Couryn knew what he must do, regardless of his sister. Mrs. Vaughan had fallen into the habit of taking solitary rambles just after sun set, and one evening he waylaid her There were some tense lines about her mouth, and a cold, strained look in her eyes. She was suffering from some hidden cause.

But she thrust her secret far out of sight. She was proud and reserved to the last degree.

"Maud," he said at length, "for a month you have clung resolutely to your own belief, and it has failed to make you happy. I am not blind, so I say again that I love you. What is my answer? You alone can make me happy. When you leave this place, I shall return to army life. I would rather stay and marry you."

Her face was crimson. There was a manly ring in the voice that she could not doubt.

"I am poor and proud. Most people would think you had demeaned yourself by marrying a governess, and—"

"Don't give me advice. Is it yes or no?"

A strange, sweet smile crossed her face. He bent over to kiss her and caught the answer in an underbreath.

"My darling," he said, "you have hidden nothing from me; I knew your secret weeks ago."

She hid her blushing face, and was at peace.

Mrs. Anthon was surprised and rather disappointed at first, but she soon recovered. And Major Couryn considers himself a happy and a fortunate man.—New York Weekly.

The pygmies generally marry at the age of eight or nine, and the men buy the wives with three or four spears and ten or fifteen arrows, according to the market value of the lady. They pay in installments, and not until the last arrow is handed over is the lover allowed to take his bride. A man may have as many wives as he can afford to buy.

Postal conditions in the interior of Turkey are still in a patriarchal stage of evolution. When a postman arrives in a village, on muleback, he distributes the letters in a public place, giving each his own, and then putting the undelivered ones into the hands of relatives or acquaintances of those to whom they are addressed. Yet it is said that ninety-nine percent reach their destination.

A recent writer in the National Geographical Magazine tells of a tree growing in the Malay Archipelago, the Andaman Islands and Ceylon, which produces a fruit used in fishing, with results of a remarkable character. The fruit is pounded up into paste and left in bags over night, aftre which it is sunk at low tide in deep holes along the reefs. The fish soon begin to appear at the surface; some of them lifeless, others attempting to swim or faintly struggling, with their ventral side uppermost. In this conditon the natives have no difficulty in picking them out of the water with their hands.

The Shetland the Perfect Pet.

The cry of the children is for a perfect pet. What the rattle and the doll are to the earliest years of us, that the Shetland pony is fated to become for older childhood. This animal is the only pet that won't at some time or other make reprisal on the hand that nags. The dog—every dog—will bite when the child becomes too familiar. There are elements in the cat's nature that puzzle and repulse the child, a something that makes it walk "by its wild lone." The goat is inadequate. We could analyze a Noah's ark of animals in this way only to find that the one satisfying, safe living pet is the Shetland pony. If more than eight children ride on his back he will shake himself like a wet Newfoundland and then stand motionless, while they pick themselves up and out from his four hoofs. A large and more highly nerved grade of horse would trample the children that were tripping him.—Country Life in America.

THE PULPIT.

A SCHOLARLY SUNDAY SERMON BY THE REV. W. H. RAMSAY.

Subject: The Religion of Jesus.

Louisville, Ky.—The Rev. W. H. Ramsay on Sunday preached a powerful sermon entitled "The Religion of Jesus." He took for his texts: Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much.—Luke vii., 47.

Love took up the harp of Life, and smote on all the chords with might;
Smote the chord of Self, that, trembling, passed in music out of sight.
—Tennyson.

In the midst of so much confusion and perplexity about questions relating to religion, nothing is more helpful than to turn to the words of Jesus and find what He taught and believed. We shall find little difficulty in doing this if we confine ourselves to the first three Gospels. If we include the Fourth Gospel, we shall introduce an element of difficulty and confusion. The Fourth Gospel sets a wonderful philosophy about Jesus and His mission, and it relates incidentally some of the events in the life of Jesus. But for a simple statement of the words of Jesus Himself, apart from any theological theory about Jesus, we must turn to the other Gospels. There is unquestionably much in these narratives besides the words of Jesus, much that betokens misapprehension and misconstruction on the part of those that heard Him, and an attempt to interpret His words and deeds as a confirmation of the materialistic hopes and expectations of His followers. But the utterances of Jesus Himself on the great and vital questions of spiritual religion are so exalted and so self-evident that we shall find no difficulty in discovering them.

What does Jesus teach about God, about Man, about Sin and Righteousness, about Redemption, about the kingdom of God upon earth? We might include other questions, such as the nature of Divine Revelation, the Church and its Sacraments and Rites, etc. But these are minor and subordinate matters.

What does Jesus teach about God? Strange to say, Jesus has nothing to state about God, after the manner of the theologians and creeds. He entered upon no metaphysical discussion about the nature of God. He never mentions the doctrine of a Trinity. "He had unquestioned faith in God as a living, conscious, intelligent agent. This faith came to Him by inheritance, and was received by Him as the indispensable and indisputable presupposition of all religion." Jesus took the highest thought about God in the Hebrew religion, the conception of God as the Eternal Father of men, and expanded and purified it. He interpreted this idea by His own sublime and spotless moral consciousness. He saw the truth of the Divine Fatherhood through the medium of His own loving and righteous soul. The thought of God as the ever-present Spirit of righteousness and love was a constantly besetting thought with Jesus. He lived and moved and had His being in this consciousness of the Father's presence. He saw the ceaseless operation of the Father's love and goodness and care for all things. The whole universe was encompassed by the Father's love. He loves and pities and provides for all. Even His wicked and unthankful and prodigal children are provided for. His rain descends and His sun shines for the evil and the good alike.

Jesus did not think of the Father as a far-off and inaccessible Deity, but as a near and indwelling Presence. He did not offer any explanation of the mystery of this wonderful truth; He simply believed it, and lived and wrought and taught with this thought perpetually in His mind, with its inspiration in His soul. God was a living reality to Jesus.

What did Jesus teach about man? The thought of Jesus about man and human nature might be summarized in the words, "Man is the child of God." This truth had been expressed by others before Jesus, but it had never been taught in the way that Jesus taught it. No prophet or teacher before Jesus had ever drawn such inferences from the belief, or made it the basis of such an appeal to man's faith in his own spiritual and moral possibilities. Jesus shows everywhere that He had a deep and unshaken faith in the essential divineness and worth of all men, whatever man's character might be, whatever the outward and accidental deformity of the life. No matter how far the prodigal might have wandered from his father's home, he was still his father's child. He might deny his birthright and eat with the swine, but the father's love never ceases and never wanes.

Jesus, faith in the essential divineness of man is shown in His treatment of all men, especially of the outcast and the sinner. He loved the outcast, the fallen. "the lost sheep of the house of Israel." He had compassion upon them, because He knew how they had been tempted, how they had been taught and brought up, how they had been neglected and left to wander "like sheep without a shepherd," losing themselves in the wilderness and missing the true goal of life. Oh, the divine compassion of Jesus for man, the deep-veined humanity, the eternal love of the Father breathing through Him and looking out through His pure eyes! It is this last that has made His name forever blessed, and turned the hearts of the lost and fallen sons of men to Him as the dearest pledge and symbol of the eternal love and compassion that is at the heart and is the great heart of the world.

What does Jesus say about sin? Strange to say, very little. Jesus never speaks about sin in a formal or theological way. He saw it; He felt its presence and witnessed its degradation of the lives of men. He saw it as the negation of goodness, as the absence of the abundant life, the blindness of the lost child, the impotence of the ignorant and foolish, wounding themselves against the terrible rocks of the world. But of "original sin," of "total depravity," of a "fall of the race in Adam," of "imputed guilt," of those doctrines of sin that form the basis of the entire theological "scheme of salvation," there is not a syllable from the lips of Jesus.

Jesus everywhere and always assumes the essential divineness of the human soul. The lost sheep belongs to the fold of the Good Shepherd, the lost coin, though battered and bruised, is of precious metal, and bears the image and superscription of the king. The lost boy—the prodigal—is his father's child, no matter how far he has wandered or how deep his degradation.

What did Jesus teach about "salvation?" How is the lost restored? How is the prodigal brought back to his father's home?

What does Jesus say about this? Is there any elaborate creed, or even creed, to be accepted? Does He tell us of any scheme of salvation or of any atoning sacrifice? Not a single word. The whole thing is simple and natural, and true to the fundamental facts and laws of the moral and spiritual constitution of man. Take the parable of the "lost sheep" and the "prodigal son." How does the Good Shepherd seek His lost sheep? How does the Father restore the lost child?

The Divine mercy and love seeks and influences the children of men in countless ways. God seeks man in the very fact that sin itself is foreign to man's higher nature. The life of sin, of alienation from goodness, is a disappointment. Its pleasures are staples of Sodom. The evil course in the end exhausts itself. The prodigal gets to the end of his resources, then he recalls that he is his father's child. It is so with all kinds of sin. In the awakening of man's moral and spiritual being it is ordained that there shall be a reaction of the divine, the good in man against the evil within and around him. I do not know how far men may go toward destroying the possibilities of good in themselves. No finite mind can dogmatize on such a question. I only know that Jesus never despaired, and that He teaches us to despair of no man.

In seeking and restoring sinful men to their true lives, the ministry of a loving and sympathetic humanity has the largest place of any other instrumentality. It is a continuation of the ministry of Jesus. His ministry was not in His words alone; it was chiefly in His wonderful personality. His gentleness, His faith in man, inspired faith and hope and courage in them. He ministered to. Men are sought and found through goodness and love and pity in their fellow-men. Jesus said, "Do good, despairing of no man;" "Be merciful, even as your Father in heaven is merciful;" "If ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will forgive you." Make the heavenly Father real to men by being incarnations of His love and goodness.

The love of God is seen chiefly in love and pity in the heart of man.

In the ancient liturgy of the Church there is a phrase that says, "God hath given power and commandment to His ministers to declare and pronounce to His people, being penitent, the absolution and remission of their sins." There is a wonderful truth in those ancient words. God hath given such power, not to ordained clergymen alone, but to every sympathetic and ministering soul. The law of divine forgiveness and spiritual renewal is the central law of the evangel of Jesus.

I stand by the side of a man in the spiritual agony of remorse. He has drunk the horrible cup of iniquity. He is sin-sick. He feels the crushing burden of his own wrong-doing. He longs for deliverance, for ease of conscience, for a sense of divine forgiveness. He is sorry for his sin. The inward "darkness of his soul has projected itself upon the heavens. He thinks that God is angry with him. He is afraid of his Father.

Love re-creates the soul, and the man becomes "a new creation." He begins to live a new life and to find a winning battle with sin and temptation. He knows and feels that a power is in him that is all sufficient for every need and every emergency of his life. All this is of the free grace and love of the Father. "Not by works of righteousness that we have done, but according to His mercy He saves us."

The relation of a child to a father does not stand upon any legal formality. It is not conditioned upon any service that may be done by the child. That is pre-eminently true of the relation between the Heavenly Father and His human children.

The love and grace of God come through no contract. St. Paul's words of those who live as servants in the Father's house. Their spirit is one of bondage, not of joyous trust and spiritual freedom. The effort to obtain the sense of forgiveness and spiritual peace and joy by a diligent discharge of duty leaves the tender conscience in doubt and fear, because "the commandment is so exceeding broad" that no man's endeavors must be imperfect. Or else it leads to Pharisaic self-complacency. It turns the heart into a legal routine of duty. It leaves the kind of legal service which we must render under hope of winning God's favor, and the free service to which we are constrained by the sense of divine sonship and love, the distance immeasurable. It is to Jesus that the world is indebted for showing us the and enabling us to pass from the spirit of servile obedience to a God whom we fear, to the joyous service of a Father whom we love. We accept this view of the relation between our souls and God upon the authority of Jesus as the great Master and Leader in the things of the spirit, as from one who stands supremely above us in spiritual insight. Love creates a loving and obedient life. It destroys selfishness from the heart. It makes character; and character is salvation, in this and in all worlds.

The kingdom of heaven on earth is the kingdom of love, a society of men and women who live the loving, Christ-like life; who believe that this is God's world, and who live upon the principle every day; who believe that all men are brothers and sons of God, and act toward all men as if they really believed this.

These principles of the religion of Jesus are gaining more and more in the world, in spite of all that appears to the contrary. The kingdom of God is surely coming on earth.

The Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Man, the moral and spiritual Leadership of Jesus, Salvation by Character, inspired by love, the progress of Mankind onward and upward forever—this is the faith of modern and spiritual Christianity; and some day it will be accepted as the true interpretation of the religion of Jesus.

HONEST PHYSICIAN.
Works With Himself First.

It is a mistake to assume that physicians are always skeptical as to the curative properties of anything except drugs.

Indeed, the best doctors are the ones who seek to heal with as little medicine as possible, and by the use of correct food and drink. A physician writes from Calif. to tell how he made a well man of himself with natural foods:

"Before I came from Europe, where I was born," he says, "it was my custom to take coffee with milk (cafe au lait) with my morning meal, a small cup (cafe noir) after my dinner and two or three additional small cups during the evening.

"In time nervous symptoms developed, with pains in the cardiac region, accompanied by great depression of spirits, despondency—in brief, dyspepsia. I at first tried medicines, but got no relief, and at last realized that my troubles were caused by coffee. Thereupon quit its use forthwith, and began using English Breakfast Tea.

"The tea seemed to help me at first, but in time the old distressing symptoms returned, and I quit it also. I then tried to use milk for my table beverage. This I was compelled, however, to abandon speedily, for while it relieved the nervousness, somewhat, it set me right on constipation. Then by the inspiration I was led to try Postum Food Coffee. This was a few years ago, and I still use it. I am not nervous, nor do I suffer pains about the heart, while I have left me and life is bright once more. I know that leaving coffee and using Postum healed me. I make it a rule to advise my friends to use it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR OCTOBER 1.

Subject: Daniel and Belshazzar, Dan. v., 17-30—Golden Text, Psa. xxxiv., 16—Memory Verses, 29, 30—Compentary on the Day's Lesson.

I. The handwriting on the wall. Belshazzar, only sixteen or seventeen years old, was the ruling king in the city of Babylon. Secure within his defenses, he felt confident of safety, and therefore engaged in revelry at a feast which he made to a thousand of his lords. In his drunken folly and wickedness he called for the golden and silver vessels which had been taken from the temple at Jerusalem, that he might drink from them as a token that his gods had given victory over the God of the Jews. During this profane revelry a hand appeared and wrote upon the wall. This filled the king with fears, and he declared that the wise man who should interpret the meaning should be clothed with scarlet and have a chain of gold, and be third ruler in the kingdom. When all had failed, the queen, mother of Belshazzar, came in and persuaded her son to send for Daniel, to whom, when he came, the king repeated his promise made to the wise men.

II. Daniel reproving the king (vs. 17-24). 17. "Let thy gifts by to thyself." Daniel as a prophet of God cares nothing for any reward this king can give, nor does he fear him.

18. "The most high God." Whom Daniel proclaimed as the only God, and whose power Nebuchadnezzar had recognized in the deliverance of the Hebrews out of the furnace. "Thy father." Grandfather. "Majesty." In the eyes of his subjects. "Glory." From his victories. "Honor." From the enlargement and decoration of the city.

19. "Whom he would he slew." In dispensing punishments he condemned or acquitted at pleasure, and in dispensing rewards he granted or denied preferments. 20. "Heart was lifted up." In pride and arrogance, wilful and obstinate. "Deposed." This occurred not by the rebellion of his people, but by the direct visitation of God. He became insane.

21. "He was driven." The madness that fell upon him induced him to forsake society and to run to the woods and deserts, where he lived like a wild beast. 22. "Thou—hast not humbled." Thou hast sinned, not through ignorance, but through deliberate contempt of God, regardless of all warning. 23. "Against the Lord." As if thou hadst been equal or even superior to Him in wisdom and power. "Vessels of his house." From the temple of Je, where they have been treasured up since the conqueror had carried them from Jerusalem. The thirty chargers and thirty vases of gold which had been made for the temple of Solomon, and had continued there till the captivity of Jehoiachin, and the thousand chargers and the four hundred basins of silver by which Zedekiah had supplied their place, and which were carried away in the final deportation. They profaned these vessels to show their contempt for Jehovah. It was an open insult to the Almighty. 24. "Hand sent from Him." From God.

III. Daniel interpreting the writing (vs. 25-28). 25. "The writing." The words were Aramaic, with letters like the Hebrew. Why could not the wise men read them? Perhaps they could read the words, but were not able, or did not dare, to explain their meaning. 26. "Mene." This word is repeated to give emphasis. It comes from a word meaning to number, to count. The days of the empire were counted out in full. The soldiers of the conqueror were awaiting outside and would destroy it before morning. 27. "Tekel." Which means weighed (hence a shekel, which was originally a certain weight). It resembles a word which signifies "light," light of weight, like a counterfeit coin. The application is that Belshazzar had been weighed as to his moral character and actions, and had been found wanting, of light weight. He had not come up to the standard required. God had tested him and he had failed.

28. "Peres." This is the singular, while upharsin is the plural of the same word with "u," which means "and," prefixed. It is given in verse 25 in the plural, for emphasis, just as "mene" is doubled. It means divided, but has the same consonants as Persians, and suggests them. "Is divided." Not divided into two parts, but broken into pieces, destroyed. "Medes." Media was a large country lying east of the Caspian Sea.

IV. "Daniel rewarded (v. 29). 29. "With scarlet," etc. These carried with them rank and power. "Third ruler." Next to Belshazzar, who was second. Nabonidus, the king, was first.

V. The king slain (v. 30). 30. "In that night." It must be understood that the River Euphrates flowed through the midst of Babylon. Cyrus for some time had been planning to draw away the water of the river and enter the city through the bed of the river. When all was prepared he waited for the great feast. When it came all the leaders were reveling in the palace. Elsewhere the population was occupied with feasting and dancing (Jer. 51: 39). Drunken riot and mad excitement held possession of the town; the siege was forgotten; ordinary precautions, as the closing of the river gates (Isa. 45: 1), were neglected. The undefended gateways were seized; a war shout was raised; the alarm was spread. The drunken revelers could make no resistance. The king, paralyzed with fear at the handwriting which had warned him of his peril, could do nothing to check the progress of the assailants, who carried all before them everywhere. Bursting into the palace a band of Persians made their way into the presence of the king and slew him.

Books in British Museums.

In the reading room of the British museum the desks are crowded with students all day long, and in addition to the books of reference some 20,000 in number, which fill the open shelves of the room from 3,000 to 4,000 volumes are given out every day. Theology in a wide sense, including the Bible, biblical literature, church history and works on the religious rites and ceremonies of all races and creeds, is easily at the head of the list, with about 300 volumes. Topography comes next, with about twenty fewer, and of these books on London amount to a quarter, books on English topography to another quarter, the other half being for the rest of the world. History and biography come next, English history being mostly in demand, and books on France and the French provinces second.

Essays, criticisms and miscellaneous literature take the fourth place, and are followed by fiction—not less than five years old—moral philosophy, poetry and the fine arts, the drama, law and philology, political economy and so on down to politics, mathematics and chemistry, which have about forty volumes apiece, and lastly works on naval and military subjects, which seldom have more than three or four volumes each. It is a curious list and throws a useful light on the sort of studies taken up by the readers in the museum.

Mule Finds Rich Lead Ore.

Half the lead that has been mined in the United States has come from the famous Coeur d'Alenes, the most productive lead mines in the world. Like many of the richest mines, they were discovered by pure luck. A man lent his mule to two prospectors. In the course of their wanderings the mule was tied to a tree, and he, becoming impatient, pawed the ground and uncovered a lead vein which is now the site of the famous Bunker Hill Sullivan mine.

The owner of the mule sued for a third interest in the claim and the courts granted it to him, stating that as the mule had made the discovery, and that, as he was its owner, he was entitled to the mule's share. The three owners sold their discovery for $500,000, and nothing was too good for that mule for the rest of his days. He was exhibited in a private car and lived on the fat of the land, and now a marble tombstone marks his grave. His harness hangs in a noted saloon, where it is gazed upon with deepest reverence for the old-time prospectors.

The mine is the richest silver lead mine in the world, yielding a net revenue of $1,500,000. Since their discovery in 1884 the Coeur d'Alene mines have produced nearly $200,000,000 in gold, silver and lead.

West Point's Oldest Graduate.

Gen. Herman Haupt, of Washington is the oldest living graduate of West Point Military Academy, and a man distinguished in civil war military history and in railway and engineering circles. General Haupt graduated from West Point in 1835, in the same class with General Meade. President Jackson appointed him a cadet when he was only 13 years old. He graduated when he was 18, and so probably can claim the additional distinction of having graduated younger than any other cadet.

Great Italian Actress.

Signora Duse, the great Italian actress, who has been appearing in London, has a wonderful power of facial expression. One moment she is apparently a girl of 16; at the next without any make-up she resembles an old woman of 60. She is an actress who feels her part intensely. She is reported to have said on one occasion: "If I played 'Camille' two night in succession, especially the death scene, I should die. I am sure I should die: the part is so real to me."

Ancient Counterpane.

Mrs. Lutie Whitlock, of Martin, Tenn., has in her possesion an ancient and highly prized counterpane that her gradmother, Mrs. Lucy Freeman, made 116 years ago, when she was a young girl in Virginia. She carded the cotton, spun and wove the cloth, also carded and spun all the thread it is made of. It is an exceedingly handsome piece of work, containing some forty or fifty designs of the finest embroidery stitching, etc. It has been handed down and kept in perfect condition ever since it was made in 1789.

It will be interesting and an innovation if Major Higginson brings over the French composer, Vincent d'Indy, to conduct some of the Boston symphony concerts this season. The Boston orchestra has always been very conservative in the matter of star conductors, as for example in the Richard Strauss episode. D'Indy is a remarkable man, and his poetic ideas and original harmonies have stirred the musical world, though his music has no such world-wide vogue as that of Richard Strauss.

Counterfeit Relics.

An article in a recent number of the Birmingham (England) Mail states that a factory in that town is turning out weekly about 1,200 flint-lock muskets, and that a large number of this antiquated firearm is also made at Liege, Belgium. It is known in the trade that many of these newly made weapons fall into the hands of travelers, who regard them in the light of a "find," and a story is told of a Birmingham manufacturer having received a letter from a dealer asking him to procure some old flint-locks, for which the dealer had several customers, when the manufacturers wrote that he could not supply old muskets, but was prepared to make him any number of new ones required. These were, of course, given the appearance of age. The demand for old weapons is so great, especially in the American season, that the genuine articles would go but a little way to satisfy it.

DISFIGURED BY ECZEMA

Wonderful Change in a Night—In a Month Face Was Clear as Ever—Another Cure by Cuticura.

"I had eczema on the face for five months, during which time I was in the care of physicians. My face was so disfigured I could not go out, and it was going from bad to worse. A friend recommended Cuticura. The first night after I washed my face with Cuticura Soap and used Cuticura Ointment and Resolvent I changed wonderfully. From that day I was able to go out, and in a month the treatment had removed all scales and scabs, and my face was as clear as ever. (Signed) T. J. Soth, 317 Stagg Street, Brooklyn, N. Y."

WORKING WOMEN

Their Hard Struggle Made Easier—Interesting Statements by a Young Lady in Boston and One in Nashville, Tenn.

All women work; some in their homes, some in church, and some in the whirl of society. And in stores, mills and shops tens of thousands are on the never-ceasing treadmill, earning their daily bread.

All are subject to the same physical laws; all suffer alike from the same physical disturbance, and the nature of their duties, in many cases, quickly drifts them into the horrors of all kinds of female complaints, ovarian troubles, ulceration, falling and displacements of the womb, leucorrhœa, or perhaps irregularity or suppression of "monthly periods," causing backache, nervousness, irritability and lassitude.

Women who stand on their feet all day are more susceptible to these troubles than others.

They especially require an invigorating, sustaining medicine which will strengthen the female organism and enable them to bear easily the fatigues of the day, to sleep well at night, and to rise refreshed and cheerful.

How distressing to see a woman struggling to earn a livelihood or perform her household duties when her back and head are aching, she is so tired she can hardly drag about or stand up, and every movement causes pain, the origin of which is due to some derangement of the female organism.

Miss F. Orser of 14 Warrenton Street, Boston, tells women how to avoid such suffering; she writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—
"I suffered misery for several years with irregular menstruation. My back ached; I had bearing down pains, and frequent headaches; I could not sleep and could hardly drag around. I consulted two physicians without relief, and as a last resort, I tried Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and to my surprise, every ache and pain left me. I gained ten pounds and am in perfect health."

Miss Pearl Ackers of 327 North Summer Street, Nashville, Tenn., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—
"I suffered with painful periods, severe backache, bearing-down pains, pains across the abdomen; was very nervous and irritable, and my trouble grew worse every month. "My physician failed to help me and I decided to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I soon found it was doing me good. All my pains and aches disappeared, and I no longer fear my monthly periods."

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the unfailing cure for all these troubles. It strengthens the proper muscles, and displacement with all its horrors will no more crush you.

Backache, dizziness, fainting, bearing down pains, disordered stomach, moodiness, dislike of friends and society—all symptoms of the one cause—will be quickly dispelled, and it will make you strong and well.

You can tell the story of your sufferings to a woman, and receive helpful advice free of cost. Address Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass.

AMERICAN PIRATE CAUGHT

Arrested in Victoria by the Canadian Authorities.

CAREER OF CAPT. ALEX. McLEAN

Uncle Sam Has Been After Him For Many Months For Pelagic Sealing, But He Evades Arrest by Changing the Name of His Vessel and Flying a Foreign Flag.

Washington, D. C.—Captain Alexander McLean, the only known living American buccaneer, who sailed the Pacific with a crew made up of men said to be as "choice a band of robbers and cutthroats as have manned a pirate craft since the days of Captain Kidd," has been arrested in Victoria, B. C., by the Canadian authorities. This news was very gratifying to the officers of the Department of Commerce.

McLean has been indicted in San Francisco on a charge of conspiracy in fitting out the schooner Carmencita in violation of the sealing laws. The American Federal authorities have been after him for many months, and it took the combined efforts of four executive departments to land him.

Complaint against McLean of pelagic sealing was made to the Department of Commerce several months ago. The case was submitted to the Department of Justice. Later McLean was indicted. Efforts were made for a long time to catch him, but they were futile. Then Chief Wilkie, of the Secret Service, was asked to help out.

Information reached here a week or so ago that McLean and his crew were anchored near Victoria. A revenue cutter was sent after him. The Attorney-General handed down an opinion that McLean's offense was not extraditable, and then the officials decided to resort to diplomacy. Negotiations were opened up with the Canadian authorities, with the result that McLean was arrested, and he will be handed over to representatives of the United States at once. He will be taken to San Francisco and there tried on the indictment returned against him more than a year ago.

Captain McLean has had an exciting career. He was master of a ship known as the Carmencita, sometimes of San Francisco and sometimes of other ports. The Carmencita had no regular abiding place except the high seas. According to information in the hands of the Department of Commerce McLean has been engaged for at least a year in unlawful sealing in the Bering Sea and adjacent waters. But he was not to be caught easily. He was aware that the law provided that the United States may take into custody any American vessel detected in unlawful sealing or suspected of operating in violation of the law.

After the authorities began looking for the pirate crew under the command of McLean that worthy changed the name of his vessel. She was registered under the Mexican laws, flew the Mexican flag, and was called the Acapulco. The United States authorities could not lay hands on a vessel of a foreign nation and McLean, well satisfied with his cleverness, sailed to the prohibitive zone and slaughtered seals in season and out of season. On his last trip he brought back 250 skins, which were offered for sale in Victoria. The Mexican registry of the Acapulco was a complication that seriously bothered the officials here for a while, but the matter was finally adjusted through diplomatic channels, and McLean will soon be back in San Francisco.

The search for McLean was begun in May, 1904. His movements were known a greater part of the time, but his course in his pelagic sealing cruises was conducted so cleverly and with such sharp observance of the letter of the law that it is said he made these very technicalities cover his alleged evasions.

From Seattle there sailed a few days ago a revenue cutter, whose commander was instructed to capture the pirate craft and to make her strike the "Jolly Roger" if the Acapulco displayed it. The officers and men of the revenue cutter spent hours cleaning their pistols and polishing their swords, and had visions of a hand-to-hand encounter with the pirate chief and his crew. But they were disappointed, as Captain McLean and his gang were placed under arrest in Victoria. The men and the ship will be turned over to the United States for whatever action this Government deems proper.

According to reports received here, Captain McLean has been guilty of piratical acts other than killing seals in violation of law. At one time he is said to have fought a brief engagement with a Russian war vessel, in which he was wounded. McLean had another encounter with the natives at Copper Island, near Unalaska. The authorities here attach great importance to the capture of McLean, and every effort will be made to punish him to the full extent of the law.

GIPSIES DEPOSIT $20,000.

Leave Their Thumb Prints at the Bank For Identification.

Chicago, Ill.—Carrying the money in gunny sacks, nine gipsies visited the First National Bank and deposited $20,000, most of which was in currency.

Each depositor pressed his thumb and fingers on an inked card and then left an impression with the cashier for identification. All the gipsies were poorly clad. They had ended a horse trading season.

Killed in a Personal Difficulty.

Mandeville, La.—William Hart shot and killed August Celestin near the New Camelia landing here. The two men had quarreled about some trifling matter. Hart escaped.

Drowned in Calcasieu River.

Lake Charles, La.—Ed Sullivan, aged 13 years, was drowned in Calcasieu river while bathing. His body was recovered two hours later.

THE INSURANCE TANGLE

Astonishing Admissions Made by President McCall.

Says Money Hasn't Been Improperly Used, But Admits That Hamilton Got $235,000.

New York City.—John A. McCall, president of the New York Life Insurance Company, was on the rack of the legislative investigation for nearly two hours and a half.

He denied that the New York Life ever had made political campaign contributions during the period of his presidency, except in the three instances which Mr. Perkins had already detailed, and he could not explain to what account these donations had been charged to.

He volunteered the additional statement that Alton B. Parker, when Democratic Chairman in this State, had never missed a chance to collect corporation money for campaign purposes, and that even during the National campaign of last year the Parker managers—among them some of the very men recently quoted as his critics—had been a source of continual annoyance to him, dogging him with their solicitations for money.

Mr. McCall denied with vehemence that a dollar of the New York Life's money had ever been used, with his knowledge, in the effort to influence legislation in this or any other State, but admitted that hundreds of thousands of dollars of the company's money had been advanced solely on his order to Andrew Hamilton, of the New York Life's law department, and that Mr. Hamilton represents the company in "legislative and taxation" matters in the various States of this country as well as in Canada.

Mr. Hughes brought out admissions that $235,000 thus advanced remains unaccounted for, and that it is customary for Mr. Hamilton to report his expenditures exclusively to Mr. McCall, who takes Mr. Hamilton's receipts as vouchers. The witness admitted that the company has on record no vouchers for any of these expenditures made by him and has not had since the beginning of "Judge" Hamilton's connection with it.

Sums aggregating this amount, $235,000, were charged to the home office annex account with the exception of $60,000 which was carried in the "suspense account." The payments to Andrew Hamilton, aggregating $235,000, were made between December, 1903, and March, 1904.

Just as Mr. McCall was about to be excused for the day he asked the privilege of correcting the popular impression as to his large wealth. He said that he is not in the millionaire class; that the greater part of his estate, if he were to die to-day, would consist of his life insurance, and that he had never personally participated in one of the many underwriting syndicates in which the New York Life had realized large profits.

During the entire portion of the session District Attorney Jerome was an interested listener.

President McCall in his testimony took the question of political contributions boldly by the horns. He defended his three contributions of $50,000 each to the Republican national campaigns of 1896, 1900 and 1904 on the ground that he was working for the success of the gold standard. Mr. McCall admitted he did not consult the policyholders about contributing to the Roosevelt campaign fund, adding, "I didn't care what they thought."

In answer to Mr. McCall's charges that he had been "worn out" with the frantic appeals of the campaign managers of ex-Judge Alton B. Parker to contribute New York Life Insurance money to the Democratic campaign fund, former Judge Parker says: "It is evident Mr. McCall was laboring under great excitement in making his reply, for it is very incoherent. But if his answer is intended to convey the impression that in the campaign of 1904 I, either directly or indirectly, solicited from him or his corporation, or any other corporation, any money or valuable thing, his statement is absolutely false."

President Roosevelt called to a consultation in Oyster Bay Secretaries Root and Cortelyou, Senator Lodge and Joseph H. Choate. They discussed the use of corporation money in campaigns, and it is declared that President Roosevelt believes that to avoid a far reaching scandal the $48,000 collected from the New York Life in the last campaign should be restored.

Factory Closed Down.

Jonesville, La.—The large factory of the Van de Venter Manufacturing Co. has closed down on account of the quarantine, which deprived the factory of shipping facilities.

Lake Charles, La.—Sidney Johnson, aged 14 years, was arrested here charged with stealing a diamond ring from a house where he was sent to deliver a package. The ring was recovered.

HONEYMOONS

Dreadful Picture Painted by a Man of Physic.

If it is in the province of hygiene to cure the many superstitions of the laity, in too many instances shared by the profession, as, for instance, that an egg is equivalent in nutritive value to a pound of meat; that the various mysteries sold in the drug stores as "beef extracts" are sufficient by the teaspoonful to sustain a famished invalid or convalescent for twenty-four hours, more or less, and that milk is the one grand, important, absolute and universal food for every breathing thing; if hygiene could only restrict itself to such things, it would occupy us to the very full while the world shall last, but there are many other errors almost as widespread and more fatal in their consequences. It is almost incomprehensible to the thoughtful physician why the atrocious vice of wedding tours has not been utterly stamped out. No matter how robust, how tenacious of life, how full of energy, how many times the four hundred years, which the good Dr. Holmes insists should be the time of preparation for the new-born infant; no matter what adjuncts to ease, of wealth, of education, of refinement, not one of them can stand safely the dreadful physical and mental exactions of the prolonged and, too often, deleterious excitement of the engaged.

The constant strain to keep up that somewhat unnatural "front" which has attracted and which continues to attract the betrothed together with the six months' siege, more or less, of the most laborious exertion in the preparation of trousseau, the exactions, impositions and fatigues of the dressmaker, the same to a lesser degree of the milliner, and to crown all the dreadful hurry and vigils which attend the few weeks immediately preceding the ceremony.

With the bridegroom it is scarcely less exacting. Whether in business or whether of leisure, and, like all the strictly leisure class, driven by the lash of necessity for amusement, his attention divided, his entire habit of life, so far as it is then formed, completely subverted, his hurried and frequently frenzied attempts to regulate his business affairs in order that he may have nothing on his hands to interfere; these combined produce a condition of the system, both mental and physical, of both the high contracting parties, which peculiarly and positively unfit them for the dreadful exactions of a honeymoon trip.

Immediately upon the conclusion of the ceremony the youthful couple proceed with the utmost dispatch to the train, and then begins the most tiresome episode which human beings with all the varied ills of life are subjected to. To the sensitive, modest young woman, the mental disquiet of appearing to the world in the not-to-be-concealed role of bride is in itself sufficient, but this must be supplemented by the discomforts of that Procrustean travesty, the modern, much-over-decorated sleeping car. The over-studied indifference of the bridegroom needs no mention here, as this is not intended as a humorous sketch. Arriving, not at their destination, for their proper destination will probably be a sanitarium, but at the city which they have chosen to honor with their incognito, they begin a life burdensome from the very strangeness of the room, of the furniture, of the surroundings and the unfamiliar and too often indigestible, if not absolutely hurtful, menu.

This, however, does not suffice with the great majority of them. Hardly have they swallowed an early breakfast before they are off sightseeing and visiting every celebrity within twenty miles of the city, too often in inclement weather, and too often in the reaction brought about by the months of strenuous endeavor which have preceded the trip. It does suffice that they should thus drag themselves from post to pillar ostensibly enjoying these various sights and landscapes in each other's society, which, as Lord Allcash says in "Fra Diavolo," "each longs for his or her sleep all the day," well-meaning, misguided friends, who have been apprised of their arrival, visit the newly-married couple at their hotel in the afternoon and evening.

Thus in the very critical time of a woman's life, when above all she needs the quiet seclusion and comfort of the home which she has been accustomed to since her girlhood, she is exposed to a series of laborious mental and physical efforts which might well break down the strongest and most robust man. Is it any wonder that the wedding trip is the first and most powerful factor in the wretched health for many years for young American matrons?

No mention is made here of the absurd vulgarities of the would-be witty soi dasant friends of the couple, who signalize themselves by throwing old shoes and rice, or in a spirit of gummy pleasantry paste or tie various labels and ribbons to their luggage. These things are better left to the strong arm of the law, which, it is gratifying to note, has been thrice exercised within the last month in one of our largest Eastern cities. Let us pray that we may follow in its footsteps.—James M. Gassaway, M. D., Professor Hygiene Marion Sims-Beaumont Medical College, St. Louis, in Medical Brief.

Under the auspices of the University of Frieburg, Switzerland, a business academy for women only has been opened in that city.

HARD TO ANSWER.

Questions of Every Day Life That Will Probably Never Be Solved.

Can you understand—

Why a man who has to pay his wife's dress making and cleaning bills will sit in a street car with one foot across his knee, so that every woman who passes him must brush her frock against the dirty sole of his shoe?

Why any woman who has ever watched a newsboy or an Italian peanut vender make change will slip a dime or a nickel into her mouth while she is using both hands to investigate her purse or bag?

Why a man who in bearing and dress is to all intents a gentleman can sit in a crowded street car with a half-cold or smouldering cigar in his hand until the odor from that stub will sicken all the women and most of the men in his vicinity?

Why a pretty girl who talks in a loud voice in public places imagines that all the men are watching her furtively or openly are lost in admiration?

Why a man in a crowded street car would rather open and shut the front door for twenty women than move down two feet and hang on a strap?

Why a woman will walk seven blocks to save two cents a yard on a piece of silk and then fail to observe that the butcher is holding out the bones and trimmings of her Sunday roast, and the ice man is occasionally adding an extra five cents to his bill?

Why a man will dodge trolleys, drays and policemen in a mad rush to reach his office and then line up with messenger boys, tourists and other men presumably as busy as himself to watch a fire company turn a stream of water on a two-penny blaze?

Why a woman will rush recklessly in front of a moving trolley car to greet a friend and then threaten to sue the motor company because its man almost ran her down?—Philadelphia Inquirer.

To Raise Ostriches in Texas.

The people of Texas are interesting themselves in the cultivation of the ostrich for commercial purposes. An enthusiast on this subject says: "Ostrich farming, already firmly established in California and Arizona, will become an equally popular industry in New Mexico and Texas, and that $2,000,000 paid annually by the United States for feathers grown in South Africa will go into the pockets of home producers, who are rapidly increasing their output, improving their birds and extending their farms into new States and Territories. I hope," this over-confident party says, "to see ostrich feathers quoted in a few years along with cotton, wool, beef and petroleum, as a profitable Texas product, and the business will begin all the sooner if the railways of Texas will encourage the industry."

This reads very well, but practically with an embargo of $500 on each bird exported from South Africa and the great expense and loss in raising "chicks," it will be many years before Texas will raise enough plumage to supply the trimming room of one of the millinery companies of a city in its own State. What the ostrich farmers of this country want most is more birds from Africa to mix with those now here, especially for breeding purposes, and a practical ostrich farmer from South Africa to show the American farmer how to do it. We have the land and the feed, but not the knowledge.

New Appendicitis Fad.

Dr. Pond, of Liverpool, airs a new appendicitis theory in the London Lancet.

He says that appendicitis and other such ailments can often be attributed to antimonial poisoning, and the source of the antimony taken up by man is said to be the rubber rings which are frequently used to close bottles.

Dr. Pond has proved that such rings consist of almost one-third their weight of antimony. The antimony is not only dissolved by mineral waters containing alkalis and organic acids, but these rubber rings soon become brittle and some of the compound falls into the vessels.

Dr. Pond claims to have found that antimony can become the source of disturbances of the nutritive and digestive system, especially through continued weakening of the muscles of the stomach and intestines.

To Honor a Brave Sheriff.

A movement is under way in Mississippi to raise a monument to John M. Poag, Sheriff of Tate County, who was murdered in the county jail on April 12 by a mob from which he was defending a prisoner. The project is under the direction of the John M. Poag Monument Association, with headquarters at Senatobia, which point out that "while other sheriffs have lost their lives in the discharge of their duties, this is the only instance where a sheriff voluntarily fought a mob to his death in the protection of a prisoner where to do so meant his certain death." "No man," says Giv. Vardaman, "ever died at a better time or for a better cause."—New York World.

Coal Company Incorporated.

Russellville, Ala.—The Alabama-Louisiana Coal Company was recently incorporated here with a capital stock of $200,000. They have purchased 3,000 acres of coal land in Franklin county, about twelve miles south of Russellville. This will be be fully developed, and the initial output will be at least 400 tons daily. W. S. Douglas, of this place, will be superintendent and in charge of the construction.

Putting Mines in Order.

Birmingham, Ala.—The Sumter and Johns mines are being placed in order. Some time ago the former mine caught fire and the blaze raged for months. It is now out, but the mine is filled with water, as is the Johns mine. Pumps are being used for the purpose of getting out the water, and the work will be completed in a few days or so, when the mines will again be operated.

Tragedy Near Brewton.

Brewton, Ala.—A tragedy occurred about four miles west of Brewton Friday, in which J. F. Steele lost his life and J. W. Jernigan sustained serious cuts in his left arm and hand. Jernigan was Steele's stepson, and from the best information obtainable it seems that bad blood had existed between them for some time. It appears that Steele went to Jernigan's field where he was at work, and waited for him to reach the end of a row, when he (Steele) rushed at him with an open knife, striking at him. Jernigan received the blow on his left arm. When Steele struck at him the second time he caught the blade of the knife in his hand, receiving a bad cut severing an artery. Jernigan then knocked Steele down and at the same time drew his knife, cutting Steele in the neck one or more times, the wounds producing death in a short time. Jernigan came to town for medical attention and reported the tragedy, saying that he did not know at that time how badly Steele was hurt, as he left him lying in the field.

Can Enter Church.

Huntsville, Ala.—Another interesting case in connection with the Christian church matter has been settled by the issuing of a decree by Chancellor William H. Simpson, of the chancery court, an injunction restraining Elders Daniel Sommer, W. Fulghum and E. I. Cambron and Messrs. J. R. Jones and Robins Jones from entering the Christian church in this city. The injunction had been in effect nearly two years, and was granted by Judge Paul Speake, of the circuit court, after trouble in the church had broken out afresh.

Destroyed by Fire.

Selma, Ala.—The salughter house of Ed R. Jones, on the Burnsville, road about one mile east of the city, was destroyed by fire. The fire is supposed to have originated from sparks from the tallow furnace, which was being operated when the fire was discovered. The building and its contents, consisting of meats, hides and tallow, were destroyed, and the loss is estimated at about $1,200, which is covered by insurance. There were stored in the house many hides, which were estimated to be worth at least $600. Many of these hides, it is thought, will be found good when they are taken out.

Thomas E. Berry Kills Himself.

Florence, Ala.—Thomas E. Berry killed himself here by shooting himself through the head with a 32-calibre pistol while in a state of mental aberration, caused by ill health. He sent his little son for the weapon under the pretext of cleaning it to sell it. His daughter hid it in a dresser drawer in an adjoining room. While there he was at breakfast he found the pistol lying on the bed fired the fatal shot. He was 50 years old and leaves a widow and six children. He was a prominent Mason, a Knight of Pythias and Woodman of the World.

Stole a Bible.

Mobile, Ala.—Much indignation was expressed by parishioners of St. Joseph's church just now. Only a few days ago vandals visited the church on two successive nights and carried away valuable altar cloths, a Bible and statues. No clue has been discovered as to the guilty parties, but the school of the church is just one door away from the entered and valuable stolen articles found in the building. There is not a single clue as to the guilty persons, but the parishioners say they will prosecute to the bitter end when the right one or ones land in jail.

ALABAMA STATE EVENTS.

Items of Interest Gathered as They Transpire Over the Entire State.

Coal Company Incorporated.

Russellville, Ala.—The Alabama-Louisiana Coal Company was recently incorporated here with a capital stock of $100,000. Simpson, of the chancery court, an injunction re- straining Elders Daniel Sommer, W. F. Bingham and E. I. Cambron and Messrs. J. R. Jones and Robins Jones from entering the Christian church of this city. The injunction had been in effect nearly two years, and was granted by Judge Paul Speake, of the circuit court, after trouble in the church had broken out afresh.

Destroyed by Fire.

Selma, Ala.—The salughter house of J. R. Jones, on the Burnsville, road, about one mile east of the city, was destroyed by fire. The fire is sup- posed to have originated from sparks from the tallow furnace, which was being operated when the fire was dis- covered. Thomas E. Berry Kills Himself.

Florence, Ala.—Thomas E. Berry killed himself here by shooting him- self through the head with a 38-cali- bre pistol while in a state of mental aberration, caused by ill health. He gave his little son for the weapon on the pretext of cleaning it to sell, but the daughter hid it in a dresser drawer in an adjoining room. He was a prominent Mason, a Knight of Pythias and Woodman of the World.

Stole a Bible.

Mobile, Ala.—Much indignation is expressed by parishioners of St. Pat- rick's church just now. Only a few days ago vandals visited the church on two successive nights and stole therefrom valuable altar cloth, pic- tures, a Bible and statues. Now it is discovered that the school of the par- ish, but just one door away, has been entered and valuable stolen from the building. There is not as yet a single clue as to the guilty person or persons, but the parishioners declare they will prosecute to the bitter end the right one or ones land in jeop- ardy.

Failed to Sign Indictments.

Selma, Ala.—Saturday it was discov- ered that practically the last week's work of the grand jury was for naught. After the final report had been made and the jury discharged it was discov- ered that fifty-six true bills, the entire work of last week, were illegal, the foreman having, through an oversight, failed to sign them before the grand jury was discharged. A number of the cases were brought up in court, and some, by agreement between coun- sel, were allowed to stand, as if the indictments had been signed. Wher- ever there was a contest the solicitor moved to quash the indictment and asked for a bond to require the parties to appear at the next session of the grand jury, which will be in January. Of course it will be an easy matter at the next session of the grand jury to find the bills over again, but the over- sight has caused no little worry and chagrin to the hard-worked solicitor and foreman of the grand jury, both of whom have been exceedingly faithful in endeavoring to ferret out crime.

Sheffield Uses Whip on Labor Agents.

Sheffield, Ala.—Some of the so-called "labor agents" were caught here last week, arrested, jailed and then chas- tised with raw-hide whips, and they instantly took their departure. They came to this city from Bessemer for the alleged purpose of enticing labor- ers from their work here. The mayor has offered a reward for the arrest of any "labor agent" caught here. Any agent caught here again will very likely be more severely dealt with. The officers of the law are on the alert.

Fired Into Officers.

Selma, Ala.—Watchman William Vaughan, of the Southern Railway's North Selma yard, was made the tar- get for would-be car robbers. In com- pany with Mr. Holt, an employe of the road, he was walking up the track, when suddenly from about ten car lengths ahead of him shots blazed forth. About a dozen shots were fired, but only one took effect, that one striking him in the leg and inflicting a painful, though not serious, wound. Not a form could be seen that was pouring the deadly fire into the two men. It is thought, however, that the shots were not intended to kill, but to prevent their further approach until after the robbers had successfully got- ten away. Three cars were found broken open. Two of the cars con- tained rope and hardware, evidently not what the robbers were looking for, but the third car was filled with dry goods and miscellaneous freight. They had not had time to get anything out of the latter car when the watchman came along. The robbery was report- ed to police headquarters, and Captain Miller and Officer Blaton went out to the scene, but could get no clue to the robbers.

A Revenue Raid.

Huntsville, Ala.—Deputy Collectors Root and Anderson and Deputy Mar- shal H. C. Arnold made a raid near Grenada, in Lawrence county, and cap- tured a fine illicit distilling outfit and a large amount of supplies. The still had a capacity of sixty-five gallons. A run had just been made. Ellis Da- vis and John Arnold, alleged owners of the still, were captured and taken to Sheffield.

Deputy Marshal Henry Arnold has captured Victor Peek, an alleged moonshiner, who has been sought by revenue men since three years ago. Peek was a passenger on the train from Bear Creek when the deputy marshal chanced to recognize him and placed him under arrest. Peek was part owner of a distillery in Jackson county, and when it was raided he fired on the officers and was shot through the arm. He escaped to Geor- gia and remained there nearly three years.

Quarantine Against the State.

Birmingham, Ala.—Alabama estab- lished a quarantine against the entire state of Mississippi Saturday. The an- nouncement was made by Dr. W. H. Sanders, state health officer, who spent a portion of the day in Birming- ham.

Bold Robbery in Selma.

Selma, Ala.—One of the boldest bur- glaries in the history of Selma was committed at Tepper Bros.' clothing store on Broad street. The store was closed during Saturday owing to the Jewish holiday. When opened at 6 o'clock it was found that the lock had been broken off the rear door and bur- glars had helped themselves to hats, clothes, shoes and other articles as suited them. Several pairs of shoes were tried on. The curtains on the door were up, and that the burglars were not seen is a wonder.

Give Themselves Up.

Prattville, Ala.—Walter Slaton and Jack Nelson, who have been wanted for the murder of Lewis Heath, are safely lodged in the county jail. Wal- ter Slaton was brought in by his brother and friends, and Jack Nelson was brought from Alexander City by Deputy Sheriff McCann. Slaton de- cided to give himself up a few days ago and sent word to the sheriff that he would be in. The circumstances of the killing seem to be that Lewis Heath was due Jack Nelson $15, and Jack with Slaton went to the home of the Heaths to collect the debt. They found Lewis Heath, and it appears all started to hunting squirrels. They had gone only a short distance from the home when it was decided to be too late to go hunting, and Lewis Heath called to a little girl and started her home with his double-barreled shot- gun. Slaton, it seems, intercepted the gun, and on returning with it emptied the contents of both barrels in the body of Lewis Heath. The first shot took effect in the lower part of the back, and it appears that on Lewis turning to face his assailant the con- tents of the other barrel of the gun was fired into his right shoulder.

Roller Cattle Guard Factory.

Florence, Ala.—Luther W. Carden, of Iron City, Tenn., and other promi- nent business men of Tennessee and Alabama, have organized the Florence Machine and Railroad Supply Com- pany and purchased the Hoxie-Kells machine shops in East Florence for the purpose of manufacturing the Car- den smooth surface roller cattle guard. Maj. A. J. McGarry, of Florence, is president of the company; L. W. Car- den, the patentee, secretary, and James Garrett, of Lawrenceburg; For- sythe Bros., of Iron City, and George L. Hoxie, of Florence, are large stock- holders. New machinery and equip- ment for the manufacture of the cattle guard will be installed.

Charges Against Postmaster.

Florence, Ala.—The citizens of Flor- ence are interested in sensational charges brought by John T. Sego, a special mail carrier, against the Flor- ence postmaster, Dr. James T. Pitt. The origin of the trouble was a claim made by Sego for back pay, which he alleges is due him for work done in the postoffice last summer during the absence of Dr. Pitt. Sego laid his claim before the department at Wash- ington and his letter was referred back to Dr. Pitt for his explanation. Dr. Pitt, on receiving the letter, pre- pared a statement for Sego to sign, which embraced a general denial of the charges made to the department. Sego swore out a warrant against Dr. Pitt, charging that he called him into his house and at the point of a pistol compelled him to sign the paper. Dr. Pitt denies using any violence and claims that he did not touch the pis- tol.

Charged With Dynamiting.

Birmingham, Ala.—Charles Patter- son, Marcus Dockery and H. H. Mor- gan were arrested at Bessemer charged with dynamiting the house of a negro woman in that city. The woman escaped death because she had suspected that an attempt would be made on her life and had removed her bed to another part of the house. The rooms in which she usually slept was blown to atoms by the explosion. It is said the woman had been repeatedly warned to move from the locality in which she was living.

New Speed Orders.

Birmingham, Ala.—Superintendent Griggs, of the Alabama Great Southern Railway, has issued orders that the speed of freight trains must not ex- ceed twenty-five miles per hour be- tween Whitney and St. Clair and that passenger trains must not run at a higher rate of speed than sixty miles. The road bed between the points men- tioned is in excellent shape, and pas- senger trains have been known to run at a rate of eighty and ninety miles an hour. The order, it is thought, is only temporary.

Kills His Wife and Tries to Suicide.

Anniston, Ala.—Sheriff Woodruff has received a telephone message from Dukes saying that Boss Greene, alias Boss Wood, murdered his wife and at- tempted to kill himself at Beato. Greene's wounds are not considered fatal. The cause of the tragedy is not known.

MASSACRES COMMON

Even More Than Before the Interference, So Hope is Small.

THE TURKS ARE RESPONSIBLE.

London Tourist Returns and Tells of the Awful Scenes He Witnessed on Every Hand.

London.—W. A. Moore, secretary of the Balkan committee, who has re- turned from a two months' tour of Macedonia, said:

"The wanton slaughter of Christians in Macedonia continues under the eyes of Europe's representatives. Crossing the Bulgarian frontier the first news to greet me was an unpar- donable massacre in the little village of Konopnitza which occurred three days before my arrival. On visiting the village I found the bodies of a man, two women, a girl and three children still unburied and laid out in the Christian church. The woman had been shot, but I saw one child whose head had been crushed proba- bly with the butt of a gun. The wounded had been taken to Egri Pa- lanka, an hour's ride distant, where resides the Austrian representative in charge of the district.

Deal Revenge on Christians.

"The story of the affair is a repeti- tion of the oft-told tales. An insur- gent band visited the village and de- manded food on departing. The Turk- ish authorities learned of the visit, dispatched a body of troops which, discovering no insurgents in the place, dealt out their revenge on the Chris- tians. The observation of the Euro- pean officers seldom deters the Mo- hammedans from slaying Christians. The Austrian officer in the Kouma- nova district has charge of 110 vil- lages, where most brutal murders are of daily occurrence, and are not no- ticed by the authorities. In the Mon- astir district, the Italian officers sleep with the Turkish army in order to observe its methods of 'suppressing insurgents.' This, however, only pre- vents special detachments from perpe- trating crime.

"The village of Mogla in which an Albanian brigand was assassinated, was punished by the Turkish troops. Nine unarmed peasants were killed and arms were placed beside them in a corn field, in order to deceive the Italian officers who were invited to inspect the 'insurgents,' but the rifles were of the pattern used by the troops in the Monastir district.

No Hope for Macedonians.

"Brigandage continues flagrantly and life and property are less safe be- fore Russia and Austria were given the mandatory power to re- form the country two years ago. The gendarmerie officers admit their in- ability to protect the population and several of them told me that they had so reported to their governments. The Macedonians have no hope left."

Mr. Moore says the country is still swarming with Asiatic troops which have not been removed since the mo- bilization against Bulgaria in 1903.

James Bryce, M. P., president of the Balkan committee, is now touring Macedonia and observing conditions there preparatory to laying the result of his tour before the British parlia- ment.

In Violent Eruption.

Mazatlan, Mex.—The Santiago vol- cano, in Nicaragua, is in violent erup- tion and is throwing water and hot rocks over a considerable area. Pas- sengers arriving here on the Kosmos liner from the south report that the hot water fell on the vessel at several locations off the coast of Nicaragua. At Corinto it was stated that millions of coffee trees on plantations adjacent to the volcano had been destroyed by boiling water falling upon them. The Santiago volcano has not been vio- lently active for several years.

Wreck on Rock Island.

Des Moines, Ia.—Rock Island pas- senger train No. 13 collided near a high bridge at Iowa City with a freight train which was running at full speed. Four were severely hurt. Of the in- jured Frank Rogers, the fireman, may die. The hundred passengers had a remarkable escape. The trains met upon the embankment just after the freight had crossed the bridge over the Iowa river. Both engines and many cars were derailed.

Wreck of the Chatham.

Port Said.—The fore part of the wreck of the British steamer Chat- ham, which was blown up here, has entirely disappeared, but the stern must be further demolished by dyna- mite. There is a hole 110 feet deep at the spot where the wreck rested.

$100,000 South Carolina Fire.

Charleston, S. C.—A special from Bennettsville says the business block west of the public square was con- sumed by fire, with the exception of the Planters' Bank building. The fire was started by the explosion of a gas brazier in a bicycle shop, and the loss will aggregate about $100,000. The buildings burned included the postof- fice, which was of wood; a large brick building occupied by W. P. Breeden as a harness and buggy store; Stalls & Excelsior, hardware; Weatherly's dry good store. The man working the brazier was injured and narrowly es- caped with his life. Insurance covers about half the loss.

Present for the Mikado.

Ottawa, Ont.—A present from Presi- dent Roosevelt to the emperor of Ja- pan was on the special train passing here bearing Baron Komura home- ward. It was a large parcel, sealed and handled carefully. Nobody knows what it contains, and nobody will know until it reaches the imperial pal- ace at Tokio. The president requested of the plenipotentiary, it is under- stood, that no notification that a pres- ent was being forwarded be given, and it was asked that until personally presented to the emperor nothing be said about it.

New Ministers Expected.

Washington, D. C.—In view of the fact that Norway and Sweden have become separate nations and will in the future be represented by different ministers, Washington will probably lose the nestor of the foreign repre- sentatives in this city. Mr. A. Grip, the minister of Sweden and Norway to this country since 1889, is a Norwe- gian, and it is believed that he will follow the example of many of his con- temporaries and swear allegiance to the new flag of Norway, resigning his present position and placing himself at the disposal of the Norwegian gov- ernment.

Cannot Be Tried Again.

Newton, Ga.—The commitment trial of Mrs. Cornelia Milner, under the warrant sworn out against her by her son, Quentin Miller, charging her with the murder of her husband, Rai- eigh Milner (Quentin's father), did not materialize. Mrs. Milner's attorney succeeded in obtaining a ruling of the court that Mrs. Milner had already had one commitment trial and had been discharged. This was when the case was first investigated and Quen- tin Milner was bound over.

Alleged Lynchers Under Bond.

Abbeville, S. C.—The preliminary examination of John M. Ashley, J. R. Moore, John Moore, William Moore, Hugh Bowen and Sam Bigby, charged with lynching Allen Pendleton, a ne- gro, near Honeapath, on September 17, was held here. The state's case was based on statements of witnesses who testified as to threats made by the defendants and the fact that they were in the crowd who took the negro away. The contra-evidence was to es- tablish the presence of the defendants at another place when the lynching occurred. After hearing the evidence the judge admitted the men to bail, placing bonds at $7,000 each, which was furnished. Pendleton killed Tom Moore in a fight.

Crazy Woman Kills Seven Children.

Rock Island, Ill.—Mrs. Clarence Markham, of Cambridge, near here, in a fit of temporary insanity, killed her seven children with an axe, after which she placed their bodies on a bed, saturated it with coal oil and set fire to it. She then hacked her throat with a knife and threw herself on the burning bed. Neighbors rescued her, but she was so badly burned that she died soon after she made a confession. The eldest child was 9 years old, the youngest a baby in arms.

Dowie Has Paralysis.

Chicago, Ill.—John Alexander Dowie, who claims to be the reincarnation of the Prophet Elijah, and to have divine power to cure all diseases, has been stricken with paralysis. Dowie was on his way to Mexico and the disease attached him while on the train. A letter to his followers at Zion City an- nounces that Dowie has chosen his successor, but that the name will not be revealed until after his death.

Turkey Apologizes.

Belgrade.—The Turkish minister has delivered to the Servian government the reply of Turkey to Servia's com- plaint on the subject of the arrest of Servian subjects in Turkey. The Turk- ish government expressed regret and promised to punish the officials re- sponsible and adopt strict measures for the prevention of similar incidents in the future. No reply was given to Servia's claim for pecuniary damages.

THE PULPIT.

A BRILLIANT SUNDAY SERMON BY THE REV. W. H. BURGWIN.

Subject: Sowing and Reaping.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—For the last sermon in his series on "The Substance of Christian Doctrine" the Rev. W. H. Burgwin, pastor of the Eighteenth Street M. E. Church, preached Sunday morning on "Sowing and Reaping." His text was chosen from Galatians xi:7-8: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit shall of the spirit reap life everlasting." Mr. Burgwin said:

Our statement of the substance of Christian doctrine in the four preceding discourses has presented the Creator of all things as a merciful and bountiful Provider for His creatures. Man, because of unique relationships to God, is the object of His particular and peculiar favor. Insisting that "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God," the divine love finds a way to satisfy infinite justice and to redeem for eternity every sinner who will be saved. The nature of the sinner, as created, precludes the idea or the possibility of compulsion.

There is, however, a too general tendency to discount Scriptural teachings—to feel that God, having done so much for man, will do more, that, in some way, a comfortable and blissful future is assured us, even though unbelief and disobedience mark our conduct here. The apostle combats such a conception. Jesus Himself contradicts it: "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." The Scriptures uniformly oppose it by precept and example.

It is my task this morning to enforce this thought: All men are redeemed by Christ; but we are not saved from our guilt and its fixed penalty until we are in accord with Christ and the divine plan. What the sowing is the harvest will be. This is the truth as taught us.

Our text is a warning—an unmistakable danger signal. This warning is given in view of real dangers apparent to all observers of human nature. It assures us that God does not make spiritual or moral paupers of men. Men cannot be redeemed without God; but, in the divine economy, God does not save the man without the man himself. The man, in addition to God's work, must work out his own salvation. For man there is a sowing and there is a reaping. There is good seed for sowing in moral and spiritual soil; there is other seed which develops degraded human character. Man selects his own seed and sows it. The seed proceeds to follow the law of nature. It brings forth after its kind—noisome weeds or golden grain. It is an eternal harvest of "corruption" or of "everlasting life." Even if man be deceived, God is not mocked.

This Scripture warns us that every mortal has freedom to direct his own career within well known fields, for good or evil. Above the human actor is the Divine Governor, who will not compel human loyalty, but who, ruling in more extensive fields than the merely finite and human, invariably directs the mortal to the future his own freedom has chosen, to the reaping of the harvest his own life has sown. Thus it is clear that man's destiny is in his own control.

It becomes apparent that this universal governor in administering his government is not anarchic. He is the supreme exponent of order and law; He, the arch-opponent of confusion. All disorder tends to confusion, in particular as in universal dominion. The human sinner is a begettor of confusion in that he interferes with law and order. He thus challenges the divine wisdom, power and will. He is a rebel against the Creator and Ruler of all things. Were all nature to follow him, the original chaos and anarchy would prevail in all realms. Perfect order in human life would bring man to the perfect destination for which he was originally designed. That perfect order becomes a real fact for man through Jesus Christ, who is the exemplar of that order, "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sin, should live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed." If we encourage sin in our lives, if we do not persistently resist the devil, we are sowing accursed seed; we are not dead to sins, we do not live unto righteousness; consequently, that perfect order is not an actuality for us, though it remains a possibility, because of the divine mercy and our ability to sow the seed of repentance, by God's help, if we will.

Evidently, then, the glorious destination of man as described in Scripture, bringing the creature back to his lost estate, where he is conformed to the image of Him who is the express image of God's substance, is not an arbitrary goal to which every creature move whether or no. The attainment of that destination is a matter of choice and decision on the part of the creature—that decision and choice indicating his accord with the will and plan of the Creator. Man has a goal, a great purpose for living, set before him, the "life everlasting" of our text, toward which it is his personal responsibility and duty intelligently to direct his way. He is not like the cricket. If you have ever noticed this insect in an open space, bound for somewhere, you will remember that he spring a foot or so into the air, turns a somersault or two at each jump, his course being zigzag and uncertain, as likely to terminate in one place as another, so far as you can determine. Many mortals do resemble the insect, with this exception, that the unintelligent, zigzag course cannot possibly bring them to the right destination.

That this zigzag course exists indicates that the truth has been perverted. Men have been deceived. In their confident intellectual self-conceit they have proclaimed various modifications of the Christian plan as we possess it. In their reasonings and speculations they have argued that a loving God would not do this, that He would not do that; that a just God would act thus and so, and would not act in certain other ways. So they have announced their conclusions that all will eventually be saved, whatever their lives' sowing may have been; or that immortality is conditional, that the incorrigible will not suffer eternal punishment, but that finally they will be annihilated, utterly destroyed; that there will be a future probation, an opportunity beyond the grave to accept the divine mercy. All of this is attractive as speculation. The truth is, there is no adequate warrant in the Holy Scriptures for any such hopes. God says, "Be not deceived." God insists that the eternal life is a harvest following a seed sowing.

In practice, too, there are dangerous theories, for "as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." If he makes himself believe that everything is coming out all right, irrespective of his conduct, his belief will affect his conduct. If a man argues himself to feeling that if God cannot receive him into heavenly realms, He will put him out of his misery, annihilate him, the tendency will be for him to throw himself into the flood of activity, whatever its character, which promises him the fullest and most satisfactory return to his present selfish ambition. Such attitudes of mind, with their baneful results, are all too common. The thought of the judgment of God in absolute equity in the eternal existence of the soul is a most admirable and effective check upon all such human presumption. Well may we pray with the Psalmist, "Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me."

The baneful results referred to have illustrations in every field of endeavor. In no other way can I account for the astonishing attitude of people whom I am meeting often—not bad, vicious people, either—but folks who are utterly careless and indifferent in relation to this duty or that; the moral and religious instruction of their children, Sabbath observance, the payment of bills due, the speaking of the unblemished truth, the holding of malice against fellow Christians; in perfect calmness men will argue in extenuation of any sin in the catalogue. Then, there is a popular feeling that a man to get along must have a "pull." Character, ability, the whole moral and practical capacity of the individual, are discounted. This feeling is so current that you may hear it expressed anywhere. It has come to me recently from different sources, in one case expressed by a man, in the other by a woman. In both instances, children are being reared, reared and trained by professed Christians in that atmosphere. Most emphatically, I resent and condemn such an attitude on the part of any, especially Christians. It is specious, vicious, disastrous. "Pull" may secure place among men, but character and ability only bring honor. Some men may be tardy in recognizing worth. God is not. His judgments are based on character. Again, in business it has come to pass that too often any legal means is considered justifiable. "According as you put something in, the greater will be your dividends of salvation," one man of enormous wealth and extensive business interests is reported to have said. That "something" which you put in is not money, or words, or deeds. These, one or all, may be a symbol of that "something." The thing put in must be a self-surrender to God, an acceptance of the Divine will as our standard of conduct. If Mr. Rockefeller is destitute of this disposition of moral self-surrender, all his great gifts are not sufficient to win Divine approval. None can buy the gift of God. God is too rich to sell, and man is too poor to buy. Any man's gifts may indeed become an obstacle to favor with God in that they may promote a conceit of self-righteousness such as certain ancient Pharisees had. It is worse than useless for a man to make the church his hobby if he gouges his fellow-men in business every chance he gets. "Be not deceived." Remember the harvest and be heedful of the sowing.

There are men active in political life, professed Christians, who, according to rumor—in some instances the rumor has been proved fact in court—are the recipients of peculiar favors popularly known as "graft." It's custom. Others do it, they say. Yes, and it's illegal, dishonest; it's perjury, too. Secretary Bonaparte does well to insist that this species of dishonesty is a grave menace to the nation. The book says, "Be not deceived." I speak to young men. Some of you may hold political position, as you now hold business places of responsibility. I speak forcefully, for I know your possible temptations. Abhor any moral compromise in politics, in business or in social life. The man who leads a double life is a doomed man. He may not be condemned to prison by a jury of his peers; his integrity may escape question because of prevailing laxity or personal shrewdness. But, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked." "Be sure your sin will find you out." All souls reap, gathering as they have sown. Thank God, there are men, many of them here and everywhere, who are above reproach. May their tribe increase.

So we deceive ourselves. In our self-deceived state, we may find a sort of comfort; we are with the crowd; our chances are as good as another's; we'll turn over a new leaf, now or hereafter. "God is not mocked." We cannot treat God contemptuously, as we may our fellows. As truly as seed brings a like harvest, so truly our derision of God resolves itself into despair. The insult to Deity always reverts to the insulter. Men must not find comfort in the thought that such willful disorder on their part can produce order hereafter. If the sowing be sin, disorder, the reaping must be confusion.

Christianity offers humanity its greatest conceivable opportunity, but humanity must embrace the opportunity.

Victory.

The joy of resisting temptation is the highest joy men can feel. It is a moment when our little life here grows larger, and we feel ourselves lifted into a wide sphere; we have a sense of fellowship with higher beings, and are somehow conscious of their sympathy. All God's creation smiles upon us and appears made for our joy.—A. B. Davidson.

A Prayer.

O God, who art the truth, make me one with Thee in everlasting love! I am often weary of reading, and weary of hearing; in Thee alone is the sum of my desire. Let all teachers be silent, let the whole creation be dumb before Thee, and do Thou only speak unto my soul!—Thomas a Kempis.

THE LITTLE BROWN LEAF.

A little brown leaf, as it fell to the ground,
Sighed, "Now what good can I be?
My service is over, for summer has fled,
There's nothing to do but to cover my head
Under snow. Ah, poor little me!"

But it fell on a flower and kept it from frost
The whole long winter through;
So that down on the ground, as way up on the tree,
The little leaf spent its life cheerfully,
Doing the best it could do.

WHY THE HORSE WHINNIED.

Adelaide was tired of shopping. Stores are so large, and there are so few places where a girl can sit down to rest. If mother had been shopping in the toy department, it would have been different; but sheets and pillow cases are stupid, though necessary. So mother left Adelaide at father's office, while she went back to the shops and sheets and pillow cases.

Father is an editor, and he sits at his desk writing, writing, always writing. When Adelaide was younger, she supposed he was doing his writing lesson as she did twice a week; but now she knows that he writes down all that happens the world over, so that the printers may know what to print in the columns of the evening paper.

When one calls on father, one must sit very quietly by the window looking at pictures in papers and magazines or cutting them out for paper dolls. One must not interrupt father unless it is absolutely necessary—like a cut finger or a pin that hurts—and one must never, never fret, not even if it is a quarter of an hour past luncheon time.

This morning Adelaide seated herself with the mucilage bottle and the big desk shears and some lovely tissue paper rescued from the waste-basket, to make a dress for a lady doll cut out of a magazine. As she sat there working, she heard a horse whinny in the street below. Some whinnies mean, "Please, master, I'm tired of waiting here." Others are "How-dedo's" to passing horse acquaintances. Adelaide wondered what this one meant.

She colored the lady doll's eyes blue and her cheeks red with father's colored pencils. Then she heard the horse talking again. The window was so high and the sill so broad that she could not see down to the street below. She wished she knew what the horse wanted. All the time Adelaide was making the lady doll's gown—blue with a white yoke—that horse whinnied.

The dress was just finished—it was lovely!—when father laid down his work, got up from his chair, and asked:

"How about luncheon?"

The nicest part of visiting father is going out to luncheon with him. One goes to a funny little restaurant where instead of pictures on the wall are framed signs reading, "Oysters," "Chicken Salad," "Coffee Rolls," and names of other delicious dishes. One sits at a little round table with father, and orders either from these sign-pictures or from the bill of fare, which is fine print and harder to read.

So when father laid down his work, got up from his chair and said, "What about luncheon?" Adelaide quickly laid down her work, slipped out of her chair and replied, "Oh, yes."

They went down in the elevator and through the large hall. As they reached the sidewalk, that same horse whinnied again; and this time Adelaide knew what he was talking about, for she could see him. Just out from under his nose a fruit vender had set up a stand of pears, large and yellow and fragrant.

"O father," cried Adelaide, "he has been teasing for a pear for the longest time, and I heard him; but I didn't know what he wanted, because I couldn't see him or the pears, either. You poor horsey, how dreadful to have all that smell and not a single taste!"

"What would we better do about it?" asked father, smiling.

Adelaide considered.

"You know, father," she said, "that while you drink your little cup of coffee that is just like my doll's cups, I have a glass of milk and a banana or an orange or a peach."

Father remembered.

"Now, I think I will have a pear today, and, if you would just as lief, I will have it now and give it to horsey because he wants it so badly."

Father said he was feeling rather rich to-day and perhaps he might afford to treat both the horse and Adelaide to dessert. He bought two pears of the fruit seller—they were two for five cents—and Adelaide took one of them by the stem and held it up to the horse. He pushed out his lips as horses do and seized the fruit in them. While he ate it, he blinked at Adelaide in a contented fashion. After he had eaten the second pear and Adelaide and her father were walking on, he whinnied again, but this time the whinny said, "Thank you."

"Didn't he enjoy them!" said Adelaide. "I guess, if you really feel rich enough to afford it, I will have a pear myself while you drink your doll's cup of coffee, instead of a banana or an orange or a peach."—Mary Alden Hopkins, in Congregationalist.

A GAME FOR CLEVER CHILDREN.

Bob and Jennie had gone into the country to grandpa's farm for a visit, and now it was the early evening at the close of the first day.

It had been a day brimming over with pleasure. The work seemed like play, and there were so many interesting animals to get acquainted with. From the least wee chicken, first hatched, to the great plow horses, they were all fascinating.

But after supper and milking time the children were ready to sit quietly and rest. "I suppose mamma's thinking about us now," Rob said, in a low tone.

"Yes," responded Jennie; "I guess she is. I wish——"

But she did not say what she wished, which was that she could snuggle down close to mamma while the twilight deepened and have a good-night kiss before she went to bed, for she guessed that Rob was a little homesick; and she, being two years older than he, must be brave and bright for his sake. So she broke her wish short off and said instead, "Let's change words. You choose the words."

"Pig to hen," said Rob.

There was a moment of silence; then Jennie said: "I've got it; pig, pin, pen, hen."

She had made a different word each time by changing one letter, and so at last made the word she wanted. It was a game they often played in the twilight at home; and they had learnt a good many words by it.

"Cat to dog," said Jennie.

"Pah! that easy," said Rob, almost at once. "Cat, cot, dot, dog. Let's have harder ones. I guess it would be pretty hard to change oats to anything—or calf. They don't look like other words. We could try, though; oats to calf."

In a few minutes grandma came. "Here you are!" she said. "Aren't you getting sleepy?"

"I'm not much," said Jennie. "We're playing a game."

"It must be a funny game," said grandma. "He's fast asleep."

But the next day they got it. Rob had calf, half, halt, hart, cart, cars, cats, oats; and Jennie had calf, call, pall, pale, pate, path, oath, oats.—Scottish American.

YOUNG ALFONSO A SCHOLAR.

Speaking of King Alfonso, it is said that his may rightfully be called the best educated head that lolls under the weight of a crown. He knows French, he knows Italian, German and English, and speaks his own language with commendable precision. He never travels without a pocketful of Goethe, Schiller and the unfamiliar Grillparzer. Horace is his favorite classic, whose odes, many of them, he has set to pretty Spanish.

But this is not all. King Alfonso is fond of mathematics. He revels in logarithms. It is a matter of grave concern to him whether the line A B equals the line C D. History he is on the most intimate terms with, and it is said he can take up a pencil any day and draw.—Philadelphia Record.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

All the push that some men display in this life is behind a baby carriage, avers the Staunton (Va.) Leader.

Give a man all he wants to eat and drink and he will find it easy enough to preach to others upon the duty of abstinence, avows the Boston Transcript.

Why put women on the board charged with beautifying Washington? The houses already have straight fronts and the face of the town clock has been painted, observes the Washington Times.

The New York Tribune says that the fate of four girls who were drowned the other day at Lebanon, Mo., makes it suitable again to advise girls who cannot remain seated during a boat ride to stay on shore, where they can exchange seats as often as caprice may suggest.

A saw eight feet in diameter has been made in Indiana. It is going to Brazil, where it will be used to cut stone with. It has 200 teeth and each tooth is crowned with a diamond. What a shirt stud it would make for a hotel clerk? suggests the Vista (W. Va.) Democrat.

When Uncle Sam is done killing the yellow fever mosquito in the South he might direct his efforts toward the destruction of the ordinary mosquito in other parts of the country. There appears no reason why it should be spared, thinks the Pittsburg Dispatch.

It used to be said that life on the farm was a drudgery, but that day has passed, asserts the New York Witness. With the modern agricultural machinery and methods that we have nowadays the farmer can accomplish his work in much shorter time and in a great deal more satisfactory manner than in the past.

A reader begs us to warn the public against the danger of boarding moving trains, and sends us a clipping from a Canadian paper, protesting against the habit of prolonging farewells in a railroad station, until after it has started, says the Newark (N. J.) Sunday Call. There is much recklessness in Newark, and not a little of it is due to the fact that many do not know that trains stop and get under way much more quickly than formerly.

The Philadelphia North American says the country is filled with stock companies whose capital bears no fair relation to the assets, but which have been launched by rich men for the purpose of filching the substance of poor men. The land is strewed with the wrecks of enterprises devised by millionaires for no other end but the robbery of their unwary fellows. Invariably it is the already rich who bribe legislators and buy public officers and corrupt public journals and carry the stream of pollution into all the channels of politics.

The census of 1890 showed that there were in the United States 596 seed farms, containing 168,850 acres, of which 96,567 were actually producing seed crops, states the Epitomist. The production of seed is still increasing, and it is stated on good authority that 100,000 acres are now annually devoted to peas alone, and half as many to beans. In 1878 we imported half our wrinkled varieties; now we supply shortage abroad and import only in case of failure of the crop.

When I look about me and see strong young men in the very blush of manhood squandering their time when they might be working for good wages, says W. F. Menner, in the Agricultural Epitomist, I can't help but recall the by-gone years of my own life when I was about the age of these young fellows. I only regret that my opportunities at that time were not as favorable as are those of many young men of my acquaintance today.

Magnet Helped a Cheat.

In spite of all the care that is taken by the authorities to insure the use of correct weights and measures, dishonest traders often manage to cheat their customers of a considerable part of what they have purchased.

A common dodge is to stick a lump of butter on the under side of the scale containing the produce, but a certain dishonest dealer hit upon a better idea. His plan was to lay a large "horse shoe" magnet under that side of the scales, says the Home Notes.

The attraction of the magnet to the iron of the scales caused the short weight of sugar, or whatever it may have been, to really balance the weights and accordingly it was some time before the fraud was detected.

Referring to betting by workmen, Mr. Crooks, the London labor member of Parliament, said in a speech that they thought that when they were backing horses they were improving the breed. He undertook to say that many of them did not know whether they were putting their money on three legs and a swinger or on a donkey.

CLEANING LEATHER.

The following directions are said to be very good for cleaning and polishing leather. Dip a [illegible] woolen cloth in boiling hot milk and wipe the leather with this rubbing gently until all the dirt is removed. Then wipe dry with a soft flannel. A piece of flannel on which is spread a tiny piece of prepared wax. The wax should be spread over the cloth as thinly as possible. After the waxing, go over the leather with a clean soft flannel, rubbing briskly, but not too hard.

A receipe for this wax is as follows: Put two ounces of beeswax, cut in small bits, into a bowl. Place the bowl in a pan of hot water on the back of the range. When the wax is quite soft, beat and [illegible] taking it off the stove a quarter of a cupful of turpentine [illegible] spoonful or half a teaspoonful of paraffine oil. It is ready for immediate use. If before you are ready to use it the wax should get cool, set it in a pan of hot water for a few moments. This is suitable for leather that is used as a furniture covering.

PAPERING THE CEILING.

Papering the ceiling is hard work, and the amateur is not always successful with it; it is best to call a professional do that part of the job. However, one can learn; but much paper may be spoiled if one is not very patient and cleanly about it. The paper is to be prepared as for the walls with the exception of the [illegible]. Do not try to handle long lengths. It is best to paper across the width of the room. Arrange a strong easily mounted platform across the room on which to walk as you hang—or lay—the paper, having your head about six inches below the ceiling. Drive a nail sixteen inches from the side wall at each end of the ceiling; chalk a stout string, tie it to the nails and draw it tightly; pull it down in the middle and let go with a "snap" so it will strike the ceiling, leaving a straight mark. Make a "block" similar to a plasterer's hook, about eighteen inches square; on [illegible] lay you prepared paper, folding it back and forth, with the end you begin with on top so that the untrimmed edge can be placed on the one made by the chalked string, which will insure the strip being hung straight. The hook will enable you to hold up your paper without tearing or stretching it, and with your free hand you must smooth the paper on the ceiling, as you will find it anything but an easy job, and the attitude that must be maintained by the body is extremely tiresome. Let the job out to the professional, if possible. This is harder than either scouring or scrubbing. The walls are play, beside it.—The Commoner.

RECIPES.

Roasted Ducklings. — Clean the birds thoroughly, put into each one an onion and apple cut in halves, dredge with flour, salt and pepper, and roast about twenty minutes according to size. Baste from time to time with melted butter. Take out the birds when done. Into the pan in which they were roasted pour a little stock, thicken this with browned flour, add a dozen olives chopped and serve as a sauce for the ducklings. By the way, remove from the ducks the onions and apples, which are to be used for the purpose only of imparting a little flavor to the birds, and of absorbing, if need be, any strong flavor of the ducks.

Beef Bouillon—Put good fresh lean beef with bones into cold water; heat slowly, and then simmer three hours; add a little onion, parsley, and other vegetable, and cook two hours more, putting in a little boiling water as the stock boils away. Season and then strain; let this get cold and remove all the fat; then heat, and put through a flannel cloth. Stand on ice and use as you need it. It should jelly, but if not, add a little dissolved gelatine should you wish it. To vary this soup, add sometimes a little cooked tomato and strain again; or add whipped cream; or cook some pearl tapioca in it till nearly dissolved; or serve jellied in a cup, ice cold, with strips of brown buttered bread. Celery salt, or lemon juice, or sherry is useful in changing the flavor.—Harper's Bazar.

La Favorite Pudding—One cup of sugar, one cup of milk, two eggs, two cups of flour, two scant teaspoonfuls of orange juice. Put a layer of sliced pineapple in the bottom of a pudding dish and cover with a layer of the mixture. Next add a layer of sliced apples and another layer of the mixture, and so on, using any desired fruit, having the last layer of the mixture. Serve with a rich cream sauce.

Chocolate Mousse—Boil one and one-fourth cups of granulated sugar until it threads, then pour it slowly over the well-beaten whites of two eggs, beating constantly. When perfectly smooth and white put into a double boiler, scald, then remove from the fire. When it becomes cold stir into it two bars of melted chocolate and a pint of whipped cream. Turn into the freezer, pack and let stand for four hours.

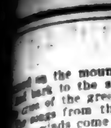
A SONG OF LABOR.



On the mount of commerce,
Hark to the sounds of toil,
Come of the greedy cities,
Songs from the sunburnt soil;
The winds come up in order,
North, South, West, and East,
Bear their tale of axe and flail,
And end of feast.

The North wind stormeth,
And seas that strain
Beneath laden ships;
Sheaves of grain;
When I pass by.
Man's call
To foe and friend!"
Stone and all."

Roaring winds sighs, "I bring the songs
Of peace I temple made,
Of cities when righted half their wrongs,
In cotton field and glade;

Stroke follows stroke in fev'rish haste
From hands that seek to shape
The fragments to a state anew
From mountain ridge to cape."

"Of prairies broad mine is the tale,"
The West wind blithely calls.
"Of mountain and enchanted vale,
And silv'ry waterfalls;
Vast solitudes I've tracked, and paused
Far-scattered city gates,
From which the call, 'We've won for all
A galaxy of states!'"

I stand on the mount of commerce,
And the four winds pass me by,
To bear their tale of axe and flail,
Before they droop and die;
For South is North, and North is South,
And East and West are one,
When labor's stroke the bar hath broke
That parted son from son.

How Capt. Curtis Got a Tow.

By E. H. GOSSE.

A few of the older members of the maritime fraternity could cite, with [illegible] at the envious, some two or three [illegible] wherein Capt. Eben Curtis [illegible] his calculations, but these [illegible] were only the exceptions that proved the rule. The rule was that Capt. Curtis undertook to do was done. His general success was more surprising inasmuch as, [illegible] nor a moral nor a practical [illegible] was he by any means con-[illegible] in regard to what he was undertake.

In the halcyon days of his career [illegible] improvements in New [illegible] created a demand for asphalt. [illegible] a schooner of ordinary sailing [illegible] it was not the height of prudence to agree, on the first of May to deliver in New York by the middle of June a cargo of asphalt from the Caribbean sea, under a forfeit of seven thousand dollars, but for Capt. Curtis this was comparatively a wise and [illegible] enterprise.

He signed the contract and sailed. He had no occasion to delay in raising a crew by reason of the fact that he kept one crew pretty constantly with him finding it profitable to have men whom he knew and on whom he could rely, for there were occasions in his way of doing business when he had need to call for services which, in the language of the law, "cannot properly be constructed as the ordinary duties of seamen."

Fortune smiled on the beginning of his venture. He made the run south in more than ordinary good time, and took on upward of half his cargo with equal despatch, but then friction with the native laborers and one of the periodical upheavals of government combined to retard the loading and the work dragged slowly while the precious days flew by with leaps and bounds. When he was finally ready to sail he had time enough for a quick passage but very little margin for inclement weather. He had a good wind and clear sky, however, until almost the end of the trip, then, without warning, it fell calm, most unusually so considering the latitude, and, on the last stretch of his race against time he began to drift idly, helplessly, within a hundred miles of port.

There was no prospect of immediate change in this state of affairs and the situation was rapidly growing desperate. At the outset Capt. Curtis had hoped that a breeze would spring up and refused to send for a towboat. As time wore on and no breeze came he changed his mind, and, to avoid the forfeit, would gladly have seen the greater part of his earnings of the trip spent for the long and costly tow, but no tugs were so far out nor was he able to speak any inward bound steamer and thus send word to their owners ashore.

Now, like the police on land, revenue cutters, the police of the three-mile zone, are, as a rule, conspicuously in evidence when their presence is least desired and never on hand when they are wanted. Consequently Capt. Curtis was surprised and pleased when he descried the United States steam cutter "Sneaky Dick" on the horizon bearing a course that would eventually bring her within signaling distance of his small craft. It is not at once clear why this fact should have awakened any particularly joyous emotions in Capt. Curtis's breast, for the rendering of gratuitous assistance to vessels not in actual distress forms no part of the duties of the revenue marine; nor was Capt. Curtis such a friend and admirer of the service as to welcome an opportunity of cultivating its acquaintance.

Nevertheless, after watching her for a moment, he executed a few steps of the hornpipe, button-holed the mate in a moment of earnest and private conversation, and called all hands on deck. He spoke to them on the relative duties of master and crew, and dwelt on the duties of good and loyal seamen, pointing out that they ought to cheerfully execute any orders that were given them, however extraordinary those orders might appear to be. He concluded by commanding his crew to mutiny and to raise the greatest hullaballoo possible short of actually shedding blood or getting the ship on fire.

After the first shock of astonishment his men entered into the spirit of this sham rebellion heartily, indeed their enthusiasm was not far from [illegible] the real thing. By the time the "Sneaky Dick" came near enough to make out the schooner more distinctly the officer on her bridge noticed suspicious activity aboard the smaller vessel and he pushed up his marine glasses in order to see some one fight his way aft through a knot of excited sailors. A moment later an ensign, union down, struggled half way up the schooner's mizzen-peak and then was lowered so rapidly as to indicate that whoever had hoisted it had been overpowered.

There was a hurried chorus of bells, pipes and bugles aboard the cutter, her engines stopped, and in a trice a gig went over her side, a stream of men slid down the falls, and long before the cutter lost her headway their quick and steady regulation stroke had pulled them half way to the schooner. As they neared the distressed vessel it was evident that a desperate state of affairs existed on board. The skipper, wielding a belaying pin, held a crowd of mutineers at bay on the quarter-deck, while one of the mates, cut off by two desperadoes, was defending himself with a capstan bar on the forecastle head, the other mate, not being in sight, was presumably killed. As the gig swung on broadside for boarding one cutthroat rushed out of the galley brandishing a flatiron and a kettle and launched both projectiles with great precision and velocity into the midst of the oncoming champions of law and order.

A moment later they were alongside and a dozen bluejackets swarmed over the schooner's bulwarks en masse. Their lieutenant drew his sword and charged across the deck with great gallantry to the rescue of the skipper, while a detachment of his forces delivered the second mate from his perilous position forward.

Discipline carried the day against lawless force, and, three minutes after he came over the rail, the revenue lieutenant had cleared the schooner's deck. But just as he was congratulating himself on having so quickly stamped out the whole riot, the first mate and a picked band began the climax of the day's festivities in the after lazaret or storeroom. A burst of yells and blows arose from this quarter, and Capt. Curtis sprang toward the hatch crying, "Come on, sir, they're murdering my first mate." The lieutenant, anxious for more worlds to conquer, tore off the small hatch of the lazaret, and, swinging down over the coamings, dropped into the semi-darkness below, followed by half his men. There was a brief and confused melee of cutlasses, belaying pins, and flying vegetables, and then the mate was extricated from beneath a half-dozen struggling revenue men and mutineers, and this last flash of resistance was quenched.

The lieutenant waited below until the rescued mate and his assailants had been passed up on deck, and, as he himself turned towards the ladder, something certainly not intended to be seen, but partially unearthed in the late struggle caught his eye. Sticking out from under a pile of boxes and cordage was the corner of a rough bale made up in the peculiar style characteristic of certain islands of the West Indies. Throwing aside the innocent impediments with which they were concealed, the zealous officer discovered three more similar bales, and under one of them a bundle of water-tight bags, serviceable, but not neatly made from discarded rubber coats and oil-skins.

The lieutenant whistled softly to himself, and went on deck even more rapidly than he had come down.

"Captain," said he, "I want to see your manifest." Capt. Curtis with evident hesitation asked him why. "No matter," answered the lieutenant, sharply, "trot it out."

Capt. Curtis's face showed some alarm, but this was a command that must be obeyed, and leading the officer of the cutter aft, he opened the desk of his cabin, and handed him his papers from the South American port, together with the ship's log.

The lieutenant glanced through them rapidly. "This only speaks about asphalt," said he, holding up the ship's manifest, "how about four bales of tobacco?"

"There is no tobacco aboard, sir," said Curtis.

"You're a liar," snapped the lieutenant, "I saw it myself in your lazaret after your pirate crew had turned the place inside out."

"Very well sir," said Curtis, evidently resigned to fate.

"There is nothing about it in your manifest, which is bad enough, and no entry in your log to show where you got it, which is a great deal worse," continued the lieutenant; "you may consider yourself and your ship under arrest."

With this the lieutenant walked forward, climbed into the foremost shrouds, and, drawing out a white handkerchief, engaged in a rapid wig-wag conversation with his commander on the cutter. The vessel was seen to get under way, and presently bore down on the schooner coming close enough alongside to permit a heaving-line to be thrown on board. Twenty minutes later the Sneaky Dick was steaming for New York at the rate of eight or ten knots an hour with Capt. Curtis, his schooner, and his merry men bringing up the rear at the end of a stout hawser.

When they came into port Capt. Curtis lost no time in communicating with the consignees of his cargo, and the latter being great and influential men, persuaded the revenue authorities to examine the skipper and his vessel with the omission of several fathoms of preliminary red tape which would ordinarily have been deemed essential to the majesty of the law.

The examination revealed the fact that while the balance of the crew had become engaged in various displays of insubordination on deck, the first mate and a select party of seamen had busied themselves with making and hiding in the after lazaret several gunny bales of junk and rubbish and an assortment of smuggler's bags of the sort known as "divers."

There was no tobacco on board and no reason for holding the vessel; indeed, Capt. Curtis was in a position to sue the commander of the cutter for false arrest, but he generously overlooked this in view of the free tow which brought him into port three days ahead of his contract.—New York Evening Post.

POLITE LETTER TO A RAT.

Found in the Ruins of a House—Reminder of a Boyhood Superstition.

Over on the West Side of the city a long row of old-fashioned dwellings has been torn down this spring to make way for some modern business buildings. While they were being demolished the contractor in charge was approached one day by a workman, who handed him a soiled and worn envelope which had been found among the brick and plaster.

The faded inscription, "Mr. Gray Rat," prompted the contractor to read the letter. It ran:

"Dear Mr. Rat—Although we realize that our house is greatly honored by your presence and that of your exceeding numerous and sprightly family, we feel that it is selfish of us to expect to have a monopoly of your society, and we would humbly suggest that you vacate our premises and select as your abode the residence of our neighbor, number 127, which we are sure you will find a pleasant and profitable place. With most sincere asurances of our deep esteem, believe us, most respectfully yours,

"THE SMITH FAMILY."

The laborer was puzzled, but the contractor, after struggling with some dim boyhood recollections, was able to explain it. There is, or rather there used to be, a sort of tradition that if the tenant of a rat infested house were to write a note to the rats, couched in terms of extreme politeness, requesting them to go elsewhere, and post it on a rat hole, the rats might oblige.

The contractor remembered way back in his childhood days in a country town writing just such a note, politely asking a rat family to transfer their attention to a neighbor who had been vindictive, and firmly believing, on their temporarily disappearing, that it was the note that did it.

The contractor took the letter home to show his small boy that letters to Santa Claus were not the only old epistles, and that there were other places besides chimneys which could serve as mail boxes.—New York Sun.

QUAINT AND CURIOUS.

The biggest leaves in the world are those of the Inaj palm, which grow on the banks of the Amazon. They reach a length of thirty to fifty feet, and are from ten to twelve feet in breadth.

Paderewski, the famous pianist, says that his fingers are as precious to him as life, for he could never play if he lost any of them. He takes insurance from time to time to cover special risks, as when he is going on a long journey by land or sea.

An interesting collection of spectacles is that possessed by Mrs. Wesley Williams of Bowdoinham, Me. More than one hundred years old, these curios were the one-time property of the women of Bath, who were forced by destitute circumstances to seek refuge in the almshouse.

The small house lizards, which are numerous in the tropics, shed their tails when caught or badly frightened. Frequently, when the new caudle appendage grows out again it comes in a bifurcated shape and the small animal is then considered a "mascot" by the superstitious natives.

A bald eagle weighing sixty-five pounds and measuring eight feet from tip to tip was turned loose in the steets of Hutchinson, Kan., recently by the Hutchinson lodge of Eagles. A metal band was placed around the bird's leg bearing the inscription, "I am a member of Hutchinson's aerie of Eagles."

Argentina possesses, doubtless, an excessive number of horses, and although the value of the horsehair exported is $1,000,000, and that of horsehides as much more, these animal greatly injure the camps, and the cattle raisers are beginning to get rid of them and to replace them with cattle and sheep.

At a wedding in Barstow, Cal., the other day, each of the guests was presented with a gold nugget from a mine which the bridegroom had bestowed on the bride.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR OCTOBER 8.

Subject: Daniel in the Lion's Den, Dan. vi., 10-23—Golden Text, Psa. xxxiv., 7—Memory Verses, 21-23—Commentary on the Day's Lesson.

I. Daniel praying (v. 10).

10. "When Daniel knew," etc. Daniel knew that the king's edicts were irreversible. "Open—toward Jerusalem." This was not an act of superstition, but a recognition of God's promise to Solomon (1 Kings 8:35-44), who had in his prayer at the dedication of the temple entreated God to hear the prayers of those who might be in strange lands or in captivity when they should turn their faces toward their own land and city and the temple. It was an aid to the spirit of devotion. "Kneeled." Compare 1 Kings 8:54; Ezra 9:5; Eph. 3:14. Kneeling is a fitting attitude for humble prayer. "Three times a day." See Psa. 55:17. The three hours of prayer were the same as the hours of sacrifice in the temple. "As he did aforetime." He did not swerve a hair's breadth. He could have prayed in secret and been heard, but that course would have been a public confession of want of faith in God and of yielding to the enemy. Daniel simply went on his daily path of life, as if no such order had been given. There was no time when he needed to pray more than at this time.

II. Wicked men plotting (vs. 11-15).

11. "These men." The princes who had been plotting against Daniel. "Assembled." Ran hastily, so as to come upon Daniel suddenly and detect him in the act. They had heard his voice and now rushed in upon him.

12. "Law—which altereth not." It was quite common in ancient times to worship the king. To alter the law would be a confession of fallibility, and an abrogation of godhead.

13. "That Daniel," etc. The accusers do not mention the high official station of Daniel and his intimate official relations with the king, but merely refer to his foreign birth in order that they may thereby bring his conduct under the suspicion of being a political act of rebellion against the royal authority. 14. "Sore displeased." Vexed at thus being overreached; for he saw that it was enmity toward Daniel and not anxiety for the maintenance of his authority which had led to the plot. "Labored." Endeavoring to find some way to evade the execution of the sentence. 15. "Know, O king." Their tone was masterful now, for they felt able to compel the king to work their will. Kings are the slaves of their flatterers. These wicked men were determined to get rid of the holy Daniel. They hated him.

III. Daniel among the lions (vs. 16-18). 16. "They brought Daniel." According to Oriental custom the sentence was carried out on the evening of the same day in which the accusation was made. "Thy God—will deliver." The heathen believed in the interposition of the gods in times of calamity. While Darius did not recognize Daniel's God as the true God, yet he was "a god," and Daniel's character was such that the king believed his God would deliver him. 17. "Sealed it." In the days when very few could read or write signets were used instead of writing the name. 18. "Passed the night fasting." The soul of the pleasure-loving king was so stirred that he had no care for food or sleep. His grief was greatly increased by his consciousness that this evil came from his own weakness and sin.

IV. Daniel's deliverance (vs. 19-23). 19. "Went in haste." A strange spectacle for a monarch of the world thus to be attending upon a condemned servant of God. Yet the king had never appeared to such a good advantage.

20. "Lamentable voice." Deeply distressed and in an agony of anxiety. He cried out between hope and fear: "Servant of the living God." Darius borrowed this phrase from Daniel. God extorted from an idolater a confession of the truth. "Is thy God—able." Full of concern, he trembles to ask the question, fearing to be answered with the roaring of the lions after more prey. 21. "O king, live forever." The common salutation in addressing a king. Daniel might have indulged in anger at the king, but did not. His sole thought was that God's glory had been set forth in his deliverance. 22. "Sent His angel." Daniel had company in the den of lions. There was no music nor gladness in the palace, but celestial joy in the intercourse between Daniel and the angel in the den. Daniel takes care to ascribe his deliverance to the living God, that He may not be confounded with the false gods of the heathen. He speaks of the angel as God's instrument, not the author of his deliverance. "Shut the lions' mouths." Angels had held the lions' jaws and paws and made them peaceable companions and harmless as doves. This was a new and wonderful experience for Daniel. He delighted to relate it to the king, whose voice betrayed his agony. "Innocency was found." By this wonderful deliverance Daniel learned how God estimated faithfulness and how He is pleased to reward it. God had shown Daniel that his disobedience to a heathen king was not sin. He had been faithful in what he believed to be right, and in the test God declared him innocent by his wonderful deliverance. "No hurt." Daniel had been misrepresented before the king as having evil designs against his authority, but to the king himself Daniel declares he could not be guilty of such designs when he was faithful to his God.

23. "Exceeding glad." That the evil consequences of his folly had been warded off; that his best counselor was left to stand at the head of his government.

After School is Past

By Dorothy Dix

MY DEAR girl, if you have the necessity of earning your living, go forth as bravely and earnestly as you may, and God help you; but if you have a good home, and a father willing and able to support you, for goodness' sake stay in it, and behave yourself. Every woman who has a "career" pays for it with youth and health and strength and tears and loneliness, and it isn't worth the price. Don't worry about knowing too much, or think that your fine education will be wasted. You are liable to need all that you know, and a little more, just in common every day life.

The country is full of mothers who are slaving over cooking stoves and toiling over sewing machines that Sallie may not only be educated in some fine college, but that she may have the college colors and the college ring and the class pin, and do as other girls do.

It is always the same story. Everything is to be all right when Sallie comes home to diffuse light and knowledge and be a comfort and stay and pleasure. But, alas! how often is Sallie a disappointment! Her poor, foolish head has been turned. Nothing suits her. She corrects the family manners, and revises the family pronunciation, and sets the house by the ears. She doesn't consider it worth while to take any trouble to please her parents. Her father may have spent thousands of dollars on her musical education, but she won't even play him a ballad in the twilight. She may have had the best masters in elocution, but she won't read him a column in the daily papers. Many a man must have looked at his daughter as she came from school, and thought he got precious little for his investment. My dear girl, just as a matter of common honesty and gratitude, spend a little of your time and attention and enthusiasm on your parents.—Ainslee's.

The Helpful Work of the Plant Bureau

By Rene Bache.

THE Plant Bureau is, to a great extent, an outdoor branch of the Department of Agriculture. It employs quite an army of experts in various lines of research, who are engaged in trying to introduce and improve new plants, to modify advantageously already known vegetables, fruits and field crops, and to cure and prevent the diseases which cause so much loss to the farmer. If a new variety of fruit or vegetable, possessing a certain specified merits, happens to be wanted, and cannot be found in nature, the wizards of the bureau will create it out of hand, only two or three season being required to accomplish the task.

In the art of the scientific gardener, the production of a new plant by what is called the "synthetic" method consist, as the term implies, of taking one desirable quality from one variety, another from another, and so on, putting them together in such a way as to compose an ideal result. The bureau does a great deal of this kind of work, which is accomplished by the process known as cross-fertilization—that is to say, by transferring pollen from one blossom to another. In this way, by an artificial mating of the flowers of two plants, a "hybrid" is obtained, and, the performance being repeated as often as desired, the "synthesis" may be made to include as many varieties as the gardener chooses.

Meanwhile every effort is made to procure from other parts of the world fruits and vegetables which, as yet unknown here, seem likely to be available for introduction into this country. For this purpose skilled men, known as "agricultural explorers," are sent to the most remote regions—the less known the better—with instructions to keep their eyes open for new and useful plants, and to obtain means of propagating them in shape of seeds or cuttings. They forward all such material to the Department of Agriculture, which hands over the seeds and cuttings to the experimenting stations. If the plant thrives and appears to be valuable, it is distribued among a few selected farmers, and soon it finds it way into general cultivation.—Outing Magazine.

Not the least impressive of the many figures in regard to railroad mileage, passengers carried, etc., are those which show that 10,046 persons lost their lives on American railroads last year, says the New York Tribune. In other words, the railroads annually kill as many people as perish in a great battle.

During 1904, according to a parliamentary report just submitted, 1073 persons were killed by accidents connected with running of trains and movements of railway vehicles, or eighty-six less than in the year before. Casualties from train accidents show a very marked decrease, comments the Indianapolis News.

At a recent official brake test in Toulon, France, the results showed that at eleven miles an hour a horse required twenty-six yards to come to a full stop, while an automobile traveling at the same rate of speed came to a standstill in two and three-quarters. Tests of other distances showed similar results, says the Indianapolis News.

In New York State alone during the year 1904 there were committed to asylums the appalling number of 26,861 people, a city larger than Cohoes or Amsterdam five years ago. And the cost of keeping them was the formidable sum of $4,320,000. Might not many of these people have been left where they were instead of being taken away from their homes and remunerative labor? asks the Commoner.

Sixty thousand wives carrying their woes every year to the police court is a greater number than the annual crop of brides, states the New York Evening World. It is the police courts more than the divorce courts which tell the stories of marital failures. Divorce is against the religious beliefs of many women and it is opposed to the feminine instincts of many more. Especially where there are children a mother shrinks from divorce because of the stigma it may place upon them. Then, divorce is expensive and the tens of thousands of wives who go to the police courts have no money to spare. If they had, they would be taking other proceedings than to apply to a magistrate for the few dollars a week which is all that court allows. Many women go more than once. A husband may meet his payments for a few months or until his bond expires, and then either hide in New York or go without the jurisdiction of the court. Desertion has recently been made an extraditable offense, which may in part account for the recent increase in the number of applications from deserted wives. Infidelity is not the reason which the women most frequently give for their domestic differences. Quarreling over the cooking, or drinking, or a general distaste and aversion are the most frequent causes. The husband has come to the conclusion that his life would be more peaceful and things would go more easily with him if he had only himself to look after, and he simply goes away. It is rarely that a husband goes to a police court to complain of his wife. If he is dissatisfied he departs. If she is dissatisfied she seems to prefer to keep him near her, subject to the constant punishment of her tongue.

RANDOLPH.

We welcomed beautiful October with its bright sunshine, crisp evenings and golden harvest. As we pass from one season to another we find new beauties, and those who are watching the dial of the great clock of the ages can see some of the wonderful present and future work of Him who is earth's rightful king. So we can say in the language of B. E. Warren, "Onward moves the great eternal in the order of His plan. Louder, nearer, rolls the thunder of His awful word to man." So let the readers of The Union be wide awake, thinking and reading, and let our motto daily be the words of Mr. Oatman, "Plant my feet on higher ground." Yes, get on a higher plane by sinking deeper into humility, which is the only safe course for men and women.

There was a wreck down the road near Riderville Sunday, which caused quite a delay with the trains, causing the fast train from Mobile to Birmingham to reach here several hours late.

Prof. N. A. Logan, of Montevallo, was in town Monday on his return from Chilton.

J. G. and M. J. Payne were in town Monday.

Tom and Lawson Waldrup, who have been working at Adger, have returned home, a few miles northeast of town.

W. T. Waldrup, out on the east side, has recently been on a trip to Lawrence county. He seems to be well pleased with that part.

John Ware, general overseer on the Duff farm, south of Centreville, was in town Sunday.

Let The Union, the great "searchlight" of Chilton, with its news letters and editorials, shine in all our homes, carrying union, happiness and progress among our people.

"ONE OF THE BOYS."

PLEASANT GROVE.

That death visits those in the bloom of youth, as well as the old, was forcibly exemplified in the person of Miss Bettie, the beloved and obedient daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Gibson, who departed this life on the 27th ult. in the youth of her life. She was about 18 years of age, and was beloved by all her school mates and companions. It was touching to see them pay her their last tribute of respect by placing beautiful wreaths of flowers and evergreen upon her casket and grave. We should bow submissively, and not question the will of God, who doeth all things well. After an illness of about four weeks her sweet life she laid aside, and took up her abode with the angelic hosts in the paradise of God by the beautiful tree of life, where death never comes and pain and partings are unknown. A father, mother, brother and three sisters survive her. Our tenderest sympathy goes with them who mourn her loss. All that loving hearts and willing hands and skilled physicians could do availed not to keep her here. The entire community extends deepest sympathy to the bereaved ones. About the beginning of her illness she professed a hope in Christ and united with the church at this place, and was baptized, which banishes all doubts as to her peace and happiness in eternity. We observe that: "Poor man is unfortunate, born full of trouble; and is as the grass of the field. His life, like a vapor, will soon go forever; his spirit he'll soon have to yield." Then we imagine we hear our loved ones singing the beautiful chorus: "I'll be waiting, waiting up there; I'll be waiting, waiting up there; with harps of pure gold, we'll sing of his love, while waiting for you in heaven above." Then comes to mind the beautiful words: "Oh! what a shout when we all get there, safe in the glory land."

UNION.

Editor Union:

Health of our community is good. Prof. Elland's school here closed last Friday, with quite a number present, and many of the patrons. We all had a nice time. The professor distributed a lot of presents, after which he gave his farewell address, which was very impressive. We wish him success wherever he goes. Any community will do well to get him for a teacher. We would have liked to have kept him here, but it may be all for the best as it is. A number of our young people attended singing at Mineral Springs Sunday, and report a nice time. H. H. Sorrell left Tuesday for Birmingham, where he will attend medical lectures, this being his second term.

KENO.

Calera, Ala., Oct. 2, 1905.

Special to The Union:

By request I begin with this week to furnish The Union with the news of this thriving town.

Some two weeks ago Calera had a fire in one of the dwelling houses owned by the Calera Land Company and occupied by Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Gist, an aged couple. The house was a total loss, but most of the old folks' household goods were saved.

Mr. Wade, an enterprising citizen here, is building another business house in what is known here as "the Y." The store rooms will be 20x40, with basements to each, and will be one of the best business stands in the city. Holcomb & Bowden have an addition to their already large business house nearly completed, where they will store their large stock of wagons, buggies and plantation supplies.

A crew of United States civil engineers are making Calera their headquarters, and are busy making altitude, geological and mineral investigations in the central part of our State.

The fall term of Circuit Court convened in Columbiana Monday. I understand the docket is very heavy and likely to consume the entire three weeks.

Mr. "Jim" Collins is the proudest man in Calera. Cause: His wife on Saturday morning presented him with a fine son and a fair daughter. "Jim" had his arms crossed shaking hands with his many friends.

Tuesday Mrs. Cargile presented her husband, "Bob," with a daughter.

The camp (1481) U. C. V. will meet at their hall in Calera, Saturday, October 14, at 10 a. m. All members are earnestly requested to be present.

Calera is buying her share of cotton this season, and paying 10 and 10 1-2 cents for it.

The 1905-6 session of Calera High School is under good way, in charge of Professor Skinner and Miss O'Hara.

Sunday evening two eloping couples from Collins' Chapel, in Chilton, came to Calera and got Squire Whatley to tie the knot good and hard. The happy people were John Burnett and Miss Evie Burnett, Green Gore and Miss Mamie Marcus. We all wish them much happiness and prosperity.

VETERAN.

AN OBITUARY.

On September 27 death visited the home of W. M. Gibson and called away from the walks of sorrow and trouble his eldest child, Bettie. One month before her death the dreadful typhoid fever began to prey upon her system, and her hosts of friends and relatives hoped to see her speedy recovery, but she grew gradually worse until her case passed the point of human assistance and death claimed her. Bettie became a member of the Baptist church here just a few days before she became ill, she being baptized on Saturday, and was confined to her bed on Sunday. Bettie was a girl of lovely, sweet and amiable disposition, loved by every one who knew her. She leaves an invalid father, a mother, a brother and three sisters to mourn her loss, together with countless friends and relatives, who share the grief of the bereaved family. "To know Bettie was to love her." Her remains were laid to rest in Pleasant Grove Cemetery on Friday last, the Rev. J. H. Thomas preaching the funeral sermon from Mark 14:6, 7, 8; and John 5:29. The casket and grave were fairly laden with wreaths of flowers, tokens of love from her schoolmates and friends. To say that Bettie was a good girl is to put it very mildly. Her character was one to be imitated by every girl wishing to live a noble life. We offer the following poem to comfort the grief-stricken parents:

"God sent an angel down to us,
Who knocked upon the door,
And took away our daughter dear
To bring her back no more.
She's only gone before
To live forever more.
They say we've lost our dear girl;
We do not feel it so.
'Tis true she's gone to live with God,
As some time we shall go.
We miss her lovely voice,
Her footsteps to and fro.
'Tis not that we feel she's lost,
But that we miss her so.
We know that she is now at rest;
She's free from every pain.
We do not grieve for her as lost,
For we shall meet again.
'Tis but the casket 'neath the sod.
We know her spirit lives.
'Tis but a part of God's great plan
To take back what he gives.
We give thee up, Oh; Bettie, dear;
'Tis for the best we know,
Or God would not have called thee hence
And grieved our poor hearts so.
His ways are past our earthly ken.
He's wisely willed it so,
But if we'll trust His guiding hand.
Some time we all shall know—
And since it be Thy will, oh God,
To set her spirit free,
O, may her life be as a tie
To bind our hearts to Thee."

TUNNEL MURDER MYSTERY

Young Woman Victim of a Strange Tragedy in England.

Marks on Mary Money's Body Indicate That She Was Thrown From Train —Recalls Lefroy's Crime.

London.—Another mysterious railway murder has come to light and there are many features of the case that recall the brutal slaying of Frederick Gold by Percy Lefroy, the notorious burglar and bank robber, on June 27, 1881. This time the victim is a woman, Mary Money, twenty-two years old, whose body was terribly mutilated when it was found lying near the railroad tracks.

The bulldogs of Scotland Yard who are working on the case call it a Lefroy murder from the character of the crime, though Percy Lefroy was properly hanged for his brutal killing. A theory is advanced that it may be the work of one of the Lefroy family, for every member of this notorious family has been a criminal for the past three generations.

Mary Money was murdered in the Merstham Tunnel of the London and Southwestern Railway. Lefroy committed his crime in the same tunnel, though under different conditions, if much in the same manner.

Mary Money was assaulted and slain, it is clear, in a compartment in which she and her murderer were the only passengers and her body was thrown out the windows.

A long veil was tightly wedged in the young woman's mouth, showing that when the murderer attacked her he made it impossible for her to cry out and alarm the guard. Then he consummated his crime while the train was passing through one of the pitch dark reaches of the tunnel.

The young woman left her home on Sunday evening, saying she would not be gone long. She was in good health and spirits.

The Lefroy family have kept the police in the neighborhood of Bradford, Yorkshire, busy for the past hundred years. Percy Lefroy and his brother Arthur, known as "Shoddy" Lefroy, were regarded by the police of Scotland Yard as the two most dangerous criminals in Great Britain. Before Arthur was fifteen years old he committed a burglary and was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment.

When he got out he and his brother became partners of Charles Peace, the cleverest burglar the world has ever known. Peace became a wealthy man, owned his carriage and country home and moved in excellent society. All this time, assisted by the two Lefroys; he robbed right and left, and at least three policemen who interrupted the trio fell victims to their unerring revolvers.

When Peace was finally captured Lefroy turned State's evidence against him. He told how Peace would gain the confidence of servant girls, learn the run of the houses he wished to rob, and then after succeeding, calmly murder the girls. He was convicted and hanged.

Not long after this "Shoddy" Lefroy was arrested and sent back to prison. While he was serving his term his brother murdered Frederick Gold, an elderly merchant, after robbing him. He was caught and hanged.

SANG HER OWN REQUIEM.

Church Soprano Dies With "Abide With Me" on Her Lips.

Chicago, Ill.—Singing the words of "Abide With Me" as long as breath lasted Miss Clara Butler, daughter of a prominent Morgan Park family and leading soprano in the First Baptist Church there, passed away on an operating table in the hospital at Blue Island.

She was a victim of an accident at the railroad station. Attempting to alight after the train started, her dress caught in the ironwork of the platform and she was thrown under the wheels. She was hurried to the hospital in the faint hope of saving her life.

Although she knew death was fast coming Miss Butler was cheerful. "Tell them I am not afraid to die," she whispered to her pastor as a message to mourning relatives in an adjoining room. Then her voice carried its own message in her favorite hymn. Over and over again, until the song died away in a whisper, she repeated the words, while surgeons and nurses turned to the windows and waited for the end.

GOLDFIELD SALOON HELD UP.

Two Men Get $1200 After Cowing Eight Patrons of Place by Gunplay.

Goldfield, Nev. — In Goodfriend & Briggs' saloon at 1 o'clock a. m. two men robbed the saloon of $1200. Eight men were drinking and gambling in the place when a masked man stepped up, leveled a gun at the crowd and ordered all hands up. Then he said:

"Step up, boys, and have a drink. You can take your hands down to liquor up, but don't make a move for a weapon or you will be dead men. I don't want to kill anybody."

His partner then opened the roulette cash box and the cash register and got $1200 in gold. A posse was soon formed, but no trace of the robbers was found.

COUNTY COURT.

County court was in session Monday, Judge L. H. Reynolds presiding. The following docket was passed on: Maggie Benjamin, grand larceny, discharged; John Jones, alias Wm. Barrett, assault and battery, waived to grand jury; Alex Gregory, assault and battery, not guilty; Claude Branch, abusive language, continued by consent, owing to the absence of material witnesses; Wiley Gore, abusive language, waived to grand jury; Wiley Gore, trespass, not guilty; Jas. Norman, assault to ravish, not guilty; John Riley, trading without license, plea of guilty, fined $60. Court was held in the circuit court room in order to accommodate the large number in attendance, many of whom were drawn there to witness the trial of James Norman charged with an "assault to ravish" on Miss Ida Shelkofsky, a girl under 16 years old who lives near Mt. Creek. While the evidence adduced did not warrant holding Norman on that charge, it showed that he has evidently made a specialty of taking very young girls out buggy riding and making improper proposals to them; also that Canaan church has been a resort of his when services are not in progress there. Norman is now an inmate of Clanton jail, having so far not made the bond of $2,500 which 'Squire A. G. Dake placed him under on the charge of "assault with attempt to rape" Miss Belle Manning. Will Peters, who was under bond to appear for trial on the charge of "abusive language," did not appear and his bond was declared forfeited. The amount was $100 and the bondsmen D. S. Peters and J. C. Jones. Attorney W. M. Adams made his debut as county solicitor in good style.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is hit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

Polite Ready Wit.

Hampton L. Carson, Attorney-General of Pennsylvania, sat on the plaza of a Delaware Water Gap hotel talking about a very resourceful and alert lawyer.

"His ready wit never fails him," Mr. Carson said. "He is like the fakir who was selling Hercules cement. This faker stood on a village street corner with a half dozen women about him. He was recounting eloquently his cement's virtues, and at the same time he was demonstrating these virtues with actual experiment. He took up a plate, broke it in half, cemented the two pieces with the Hercules, and then suspended from the mended plate a ten-pound weight.

"'Look-a-here,' he said. 'There is no cement like the Hercules. It is always ready, it needs no heating, and it is strong as steel. To this plate, for instance, I have just hung a ten pound weight. I will now remove that weight and substitute a twenty-five pound one. The cement, you see holds firm. I now increase the weight to thirty pounds, and'—

"Crash! The plate broke. The little audience smiled.

"But the fakir, not at all perturbed, went on:

"And you will observe, ladies, that the plate now breaks with ease, thus giving us an opportunity to cement the edges more firmly together whenever it is desirable to do so."—Buffalo Enquirer.

Block Island.

Block Island is grassy green and there are no snakes there. The Celtic residents of Worcester, Boston and Providence have found this out and furnish most of the summer visitors. The natives are the purest of New Englanders. There are about 1200 of them.

Mackerel are now running. The fishermen get three cents a pound for them. Swordfish, the next great catch, fetch four cents at the dock and about $1 per pound at the hotels.

There is a grave marked 1687 in the ancient cemetery. The birth-date—that of a woman—is of the year before Shakespeare died. The First Citizen of Block Island was born the year of Shakespeare's death and lived to be 102 years old.

The men live and die on the sea. "Lost in sight of home and loved ones" is a line on a recent tomb.

Modern wrecks are of steel vessels and they refuse to break up. There is little in a wreck nowadays for the populace except excitement.

For transportation the island is up to New York. It still sticks to horse cars—has two of them.—New York Press.

'Twasn't His Name.

An officious individual, who probably had in mind the ordinance of Councils requiring all vending carts and wagons to bear the owner's name and license number, seemed to be greatly concerned recently on beholding a vehicle on South Penn Square which bore only a few undecipherable hieroglyphics where the name should have been. Approaching the driver, he pointed to the faded lettering and remarked: "My good fellow, do you know that your name is obliterated" "Whoa! What's that?" queried the teamster, pulling up. "I said your name is obliterated." "You're away off," retorted the driver; "my name is O'Brien. Git ep!"—Philadelphia Record.

The Western Wife

She walked behind the lagging mules
That drew the breaker through the soil;
Hers were the early rising rules
Hers were the eyes of wifely toil.

The smitten prairie blossoms fair,
The sod-home faded from the scene;
Firm gables met the whisp'ring air,
Deep porches lent repose serene.

But with'ring brow and snowy tress
Bespeak the early days of strife;
And there's the deeper wrought impress—
The untold pathos of the wife.

O western mother! in thy praise
No artist paints, nor poet sings,
But from the rosary of days
God's angels shape immortal wings!

THE INVULNERABILITY OF PRESTON

BY NELLIE CRAVEY GILLMORE

(Copyright, 1905, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

When Jack Preston once said to his wife that nothing in the world could possibly shake his faith in her, he believed, conscientiously, that it was the truth. That not the slightest thing had ever happened, either before their marriage or after it, to interfere with this conviction, may have had a great deal to do with its firmness. But Preston's opinion seemed, to himself, to be based upon his own fine fidelity in his wife's integrity; upon a conception that was too liberal to descend to pettiness.

On this same subject, Mrs. Preston entertained her own separate views—not unmixed with considerable doubt. And the doubt rankled. Finally, it assumed such proportions, that she set about evolving a means of experiment whereby she could ascertain a solution that would be entirely satisfactory. In doing this, there were a great many things she failed to consider at all—as offset by the one passion to discover whether her husband was really so invulnerable as he imagined himself.

One morning, she went into her study with a determined plan in view. She tore up half a dozen sheets of paper before she finally managed a letter to her satisfaction. It ran as follows:

Mr. J. H. Preston, New York City.

"Dear Sir:—Heed a friend's disinterested and well-meant advice and keep a sharp eye on your wife. A great many more things than this might be said but a word to the wise, etc."

"Observer."

She made a careful type copy of the above, sealed and clicked off the address to her husband's postoffice box. Then she locked her desk, pinned on her hat and went hurriedly out into the street, walking with a sort of guilty, nervous haste till she reached a mail box. Dropping it in quickly, she reversed her steps with more of leisure and returned at once to her sittingroom and study.

When Preston came in, half an hour later, his wife was industriously engaged upon her correspondence.

"Care about going out to the races this afternoon?" he asked after a little, idly fingering the pages of a magazine.

Mrs. Preston hesitated a moment. It took a good deal of will power to resist, but she made up her mind and must play the part she had set herself.

"I am very sorry," she replied, studiedly, "but some friends have invited me to go automobiling, and—" she paused.

"Some friends?"

"Yes; the Kelbys, you know."

"I know, of course. But—"

"Well?"

"Well, it seems that you always have something else on hand when I ask you to go anywhere."

"Purely a coincidence. Experience should teach you that I'd far rather go with you."

"Then break this engagement and come with me," he pleaded.

"Impossible. It would spoil the party, and I couldn't take such a responsibility on my shoulders."

Preston colored, crossing his knees

With a sort of nervous, guilty haste.

with a sudden gesture of petulance.

His wife watched him closely for several seconds, through contracted lashes. "Looking at you now," she remarked laughingly, "one would actually suppose you to be jealous."

"That is utter nonsense."

"Being jealous?" she hazarded.

"Certainly."

After an instant's reflection, Mrs. Preston rose, and coming over to where her husband sat, bent over the back of his chair and touched his cheeks with the tips of her fingers. "Jack," she began in a queer little tone, "isn't there anything that could make you jealous about me. Don't you love me enough?" she added wistfully.

"I love you too much, that is it," he responded swiftly.

"Of course we've argued all this before—and always with the self-same result. But I had commenced to hope—"

"Yes?"

"That possibly you had grown more—human."

"I hope I have not grown more narrow."

"Suppose," she ventured, tentative-

"Jack!"

ly, after a pause, "that you—that some one were to tell you—that you were just to find out—"

"Ridiculous!" he brusquely interposed. "Do you suppose that I am capable of allowing any one to talk to me?"

"Oh, no. Only—these things sometimes happen without our being exactly able to prevent them."

Preston reached up suddenly and drew her down to his knee. "My dear little woman," he deprecated gravely, "my ears were made to hear only your praises. My eyes, for your virtues alone."

"Jack! How gallant you are. And what a silly you must think I am."

Dinner was announced at this juncture, and at the conclusion of the meal, Preston returned to his office.

When he had disappeared down the wide avenue, Mrs. Preston ran upstairs as fast as she could and threw herself, face-down, on a sofa in her bedroom and burst into a storm of sobs. What a little fool she had been, to be sure, to tamper with her husband's faith in so ignominious a manner. But it was too late to draw back now. Confession would only serve to brand her as a simpleton, and somehow, the idea of turning the whole thing into a joke, appeared almost ghastly in its farcical aspect. There was but one thing left to do, and that was to stick it out. So, stick it out she did.

The next morning at breakfast Preston greeted her as usual. There were no constrained silences; no forced gayety to hide any inward emotion. At dinner it was just the same. At the opera that night, and again in the morning.

Mrs. Preston had begun to hope and thank heaven in the hope that her husband had never received that letter. She did as she pleased, went where she pleased and remained away as long as she felt disposed to, and all without question or explanation. Her husband was always the same.

But the strain had commenced to tell upon her. On more than one occasion she was on the point of blurting out the whole thing, but prudence held her back. And so the days passed.

One morning Preston announced his intention of going duck hunting. Mrs. Preston watched him feverishly, as he made a few hasty preparations, exchanging his coat for a shooting jacket, and the soft gray Alpine for a riding cap.

When the last echo of the horse's hoofs had died away, she went back to her husband's dressing room with a beating heart. It was the work of a minute to empty the pockets of his coat. There were several letters, some memoranda and a box of matches.

Mrs. Preston examined letter after letter with eager eyes, her fingers trembling beyond resistance as she went through them.

Yes, the anonymous letter was there; it had been opened and read, then—and ignored!

All at once the door opened and closed and Preston himself came quickly into the room.

"I forgot my ammunition—the most important thing—" he began, then stopped short in the middle of the floor.

"Jack!"

He answered her with a surprised look, taking in the situation at a glance.

"I found this letter," she said, coldly. "What do you think of it?"

"What do I think of it?" he asked, coming closer. "Why—I haven't really thought much about it." He smiled. "Then you care so little—"

"Things of that sort have a way of not worrying me much, Kitty." He took the letter from her hand as he spoke, and held it up so that the light could shine through. "Did you examine the water mark on this?" he asked, giving her cheek a playful pinch of deprecation.

Mrs. Preston felt her heart lurch and tears of vexation crowd, smarting, to her eyes. "We haven't a corner on stationery, have we, Jack?" she asked, with a lame attempt at indignation. But Preston shook his head and smiled again.

And Mrs. Preston is still at sea.

QUESTION HE OBJECTED TO.

Victim of Cyclone Would Answer All but One.

"Yes," replied the man from Arkansas when asked if he had ever experienced any cyclones in his locality, "I've been through a cyclone or two, and I don't hanker after any more."

"Can you give us any particulars about them?" was asked.

"Why, yes, a few. When the last cyclone came along I was out in the field plowing with a four-mewl team. I started to run for cover, but I had not gone more'n four rods when the wind picked me up, and the next thing I knew I was astride of the back of one of them mewls, and we were both in a tree top, 50 feet above the ground. The handles had been twisted out of the plow and driven right through the trunk of the tree and one of the other mewls was hanging to them by his tail."

"That was a queer thing. And so you were left in the tree top?"

"I was."

"And—and—"

"That's all."

"But I want to ask you—"

"I don't care to say anything more."

"But look here," said the questioner. "You were blown into a tree top along with a mule and—"

"Please don't press me sir."

"But can't I ask you how you got down?"

"Oh, yes, you can ask that and welcome, and I'll answer you that some fellers came along and chopped the tree down. I thought you was going to ask me if the wind blew my hat-band off and if I ever recovered it again, and that's a question I hain't going to answer for anybody."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

When Hadley's Reign Began.

A few years ago, when Timothy Dwight was succeeded as president of Yale university by Arthur T. Hadley, the exercises attendant upon the transfer of authority were marred by a heavy fall of rain, which drenched the column of people moving across the campus in honor of the event.

President Dwight and Prof. Hadley, the former old and bent and gray, and the latter comparatively young, erect and strong, were at the head of the column, walking arm in arm. Some one handed the couple an umbrella, and Prof. Hadley was about to open it, when the older man, who is noted for his kindly heart and witty remarks, as well as for his profound learning, took it from his hands and said, as he unfolded it and placed it over their heads:

"Let me carry it, professor. Your reign will begin to-morrow."

Whom Dr. Reed Was Addressing.

The late Thomas B. Reed told the writer the following story:

Dr. Reed of Indianapolis, who was in Congress at one time, was opening the Sunday morning service at his church with the usual prayer. While he was in the midst of the prayer a stranger entered the church and took a seat far back.

Dr. Reed was praying in a low voice, and the man in the rear, after straining his ears for a while, called out: "Pray louder, Dr. Reed; I can't hear you."

Dr. Reed paused, opened his eyes, and turned them around till they rested on the man in the rear; then he said: "I was not addressing you; I was speaking to God."

LEARN TO WALK WELL.

Even English Admit American Women Excel in This Respect.

A contemporary has been waxing eloquent over the woman who walks well, and lamenting the rarity of grace and dignity in the average woman's gait. And it must be confessed, if the woman whom one sees in the streets of the metropolis be taken as an example, a waddling walk or little mincing tripping steps seem to be all-prevalent.

An English woman walks worse than any other woman. The French woman steps out with lightness and ease; the American with a fine strength and an air as if the pavement belonged to her, and should be honored by the tread of her little feet; and as for the Spanish woman, even lighter and slimmer of foot that the daughters of Jonathan, why hers is the very prettiest of motion.

An Englishwoman, if I may so express myself, is handicapped by her feet. Hers are far, very far, from the neatest known, and her mauvaise honte in showing them to a watchful world, how natural.

Poor thing, she is too often in a hurry. She does more in her day than any other woman, and it is not possible to be graceful while hustling.

Walk slowly, (says a master of deportment), with a quiet swing, but with a swing, head back and your weight on each foot in turn. Take care not to rob yourself of inches by giving at the knees. Practise with a book on your head at home, and say to yourself meanwhile as a suggestion: "The poetry of motion. The poetry of motion."—Gentlewoman, London.

Not a Matter of Speed.

Dr. W. W. Keen, the noted surgeon of Philadelphia, was praising speed in surgical operations. The best surgeons, he declared, were always the swiftest. Speed was one of the great essentials of fine operating, since, the briefer the period passed by the patient under the knife, the greater the chance for his complete recovery.

"On this head," Dr. Keen continued, smiling, "there is a story of a distinguished English surgeon.

"He performed successfully a difficult and delicate operation on a millionaire banker's wife, and naturally, the bill that he rendered for this operation was a large one. It was not exorbitant, but it was enough—a reasonable and just bill.

"The banker, though, thought otherwise. With an imprecation he declared the bill to be an outrage.

"'Why,' he cried, 'the operation only took you ten minutes.'

"The surgeon laughed.

"'Oh,' he said, 'if that is your only objection, the next time any of your family needs an operation, I'll keep them two or three hours under the knife.'"

Not Guilty.

"In Paris," said a lady who had had the bitter experience of being knocked down by a cab and then brought to book for being in the way, "they run over you and make you pay for the privilege." Perhaps the old colored man was sufficiently traveled to fear a similar outcome.

There had been a railway collision near a country town and a shrewd lawyer had hurried to the scene of disaster. He noticed this old man with a badly fractured head and hurried up to him where he lay moaning on the ground.

"How about damages?" he began.

But the sufferer waved him off.

"G'way, boss, g'way," he said. "Ah neber hit de train. Ah nebber done such a t'ing in all mah life! Yo' cyain't get no damages out ob me!"—Valentine Democrat.

Would Do Just as Well.

A white-haired old French-Canadian entered a store adjoining the postoffice in a New Hampshire village and requested the aid of the clerk in addressing a letter.

"Ah want him to go to mah nephew, Mis' Olive Bedeau, Franklin," said he, producing what had once been a square of white enevelope.

"Sure. How do you spell 'Bedeau'?" asked the clerk, whose scholastic attainments did not embrace a very extensive acquaintance with French surnames.

"Do' 'no' how to spell 'Bedeau'?"

"No."

"Wal, den," and the old man scratched his head reflectively for some seconds, 'you jes' mak' 'Mis' Olive Bradley.' Dat her name ever sence she bin got marrie."—Lippincott.

Justified.

The professor was delivering an eloquent address on cruelty to animals, and to illustrate how a little judicious forethought would eliminate to a great extent the sufferings that even small insects are subject to, said: "As I was coming through the hall to-night I saw a bald-headed gentleman very harshly treat a little innocent housefly which had alighted on his head. Now, if there was any justification for such bad temper I would be quite justified in indulging in it at the present moment, for a fly has just alighted on the back of my head. Now it is coming down my brow; now it is coming on to my—— G-r-r-eat Pyramids of Egypt, it's a—wasp!"—London Tit-Bits.

Seeking "Elixir of Life"

Terrible Story That Comes From Russia Reads Like a Tale of the Middle Ages — Lives of Young Children Sacrificed.

Throughout the middle ages there were current tales of men who caught and sacrificed babies in their unholy pursuit of knowledge. Recently stories of a somewhat similar kind have been revived in China as part of the crusade against Americans. Here is a yarn of the same character from Russia: "Two women of gigantic stature took a furnished house in the principal street of the village of Dubovo. They seldom went out in the daytime, but were often seen in town and out on the country roads at night. On last Christmas day the 4-year-old daughter of a blacksmith mysteriously disappeared while carrying his midday meal to her father's forge. The whole place and the sourrounding country were scoured in vain, but no trace of the little one was found. Five days later the baby daughter of an inn-keeper vanished. On Feb. 4 the twin children of a widow went to slide on a pond, but failed to return. Search resulted in the discoverey of a large hole in the ice, but the bodies of the children could not be found. During the month of March five more children unaccountably vanished.

Services Poorly Paid For

Disraeli's Forty-Nine Years of Strenuous Work for the British Empire Very Inadequately Recompensed by the Nation.

The Earl of Beaconsfield first sought to enter parliament in 1832, and it was not till 1837 that he was returned for Maidenstone, says Chambers' Journal. From his first appearance as a candidate for Wyncombe in the former year till his death in 1881 he sat either in the house of commons or the house of lords, and for something like fifteen years he was the leader of his party.

What, from the financial standpoint, was his reward? Altogether, he held office as chancellor of the exchequer or first lord of the treasury for periods which amounted in all to ten or eleven years, at the rate of $25,000 a year. In that time he could have received very little more than $250,000. Yet in order to obtain a seat in parliament, and to keep it, he had in the course of his career to fight seven contested elections and to present himself on nine other occasions for reelection.

In those days election expenses were not limited as they are now and almost anything might be spent. The probability is that in one way and another Mr. Disraeli could not have spent much less than $100,000 in elections alone. It is reasonable also to assume that during the forty years that he sat in the house of commons many calls were made upon his private purse by constituents and others—and only members of parliament know how much can be absorbed by donations, contributions and subscriptions.

If Mr. Disraeli gave only $1,200 a year, he must, during his career, have spent $50,000 in this way, making with election expenses, $150,000, and leaving out of his aggregate emolument of $250,000 only $100,000 for forty-nine years' strenuous work. In round figures, the whole sum represents only an average income for the time he was in public life of something like $2,000 a year.

Steam's Work for Humanity

Conditions Prove That Inventor of New Power Was the Greatest Benefactor the World Has Ever Known.

We doubt whether our labors to accomplish either of these objects to this publication, if ever so successful, could produce such complete mitigation (rather abolition) of animal suffering as the substitution of locomotive machinery for the inhuman, merciless treatment of horses in our stage-coaches. The man who started the first steam carriage was the greatest benefactor to the cause of humanity the world ever had.

But in a political view the subject is very important. We have a superabundant population with a very limited territory, while each horse requires a greater quantity of land than would be sufficient to support a man. How extensive then would be the beneficial effect of withdrawing two-thirds of the horse and appropriating the land required for them to the rearing of cattle and to agricultural produce.

The Liverpool and Manchester steam coaches have driven fourteen horse coaches off the road. Each of the horse coaches employed two sets of horses—there being three stages, and a change of four horses each stage. The total horses employed by these coaches was therefore 168.

Now each horse consumes, on an average, in pasture, hay and corn annually the produce of 1½ acres. The whole would thus consume the produce of 252 acres.

Suppose, therefore, "every man his acre," upon which to rear his food, which some politicians have deemed sufficient, the maintenance of 252 families is gained to the country by these steam coaches.

The average number in families is six, that is, four children, besides father and mother. The subsistence of 1,512 individuals is thus attained.—Voice of Humanity, 1882.

Early Rising Passing Away

Changed Conditions of Life Have Caused a Departure from the Precepts Laid Down by the Time-Honored Adage.

One of the bugaboos of mundane existence is the "early to bed and early to rise" adage, which has troubled the conscience of so many millions of people. That tantalizing old jingle about early rising making a man healthy, wealthy and wise is responsible for more misery in the world than all the other good-behavior maxims and rules for success put together; but it is gratifying to observe that the present generation is not so complaisant in obeying the rule as the good but misguided men and women of yesterday. The early rising fad is not much in vogue now in the cities, and it will not be many years before the beneficent reform will take root in the country. The cause of this change, of course, is in the change from early to late hours in thickly settled localities. The urban population occupies its evenings in pleasurable pursuits and retires at an hour that is not in harmony with the advice that was inculcated daily in the minds of our grandmothers and grandfathers. Another great change is the number of occupations that require night work for in every large city there are thousands of men and women who work by night and sleep during the day. The theater is also an important factor in keeping people awake until late at night. In olden times there were so many amusements and distractions in the daily life, and after our fathers and parents finished their days' work there was nothing better to do than to go to bed. In these days of rushing business and varied pleasures, however, humanity just begins to live itself when "darkness falls from the wings of night," when the pale rays of the electrics drive holes in the ebon atmosphere, and the noise in the downtown thoroughfares rings in the ear.—Rochester Post-Express.

Through Love Lighted Ways

To Higher Realms of Thought, and All the Blessings of Mankind, Are Through Love's Power Taught.

Through love lit ways the soul is led
To higher realms of thought,
And all the blessings of mankind
Are through love's power taught.
'Tis love that brings life's happiness
And fills us with content.
So we shall know the highest joys
That for our lives were meant.

Love drives the petty evil thoughts
All out of human hearts,
And to the souls that love will rule
It sweetest peace imparts.
They know the lessons Jesus taught,
His precepts will obey.
And happiness they'll surely find
Along life's love lit way.

They'll scatter sunshine all around
And make mankind rejoice
That there are those who hear and heed
The blessed Savior's voice.
Who teach the world that God is love
And through its power we Can find a paradise on earth
If we'll God's wisdom see.

And ever keep the thought in mind
To live the golden rule,
And see that it is daily taught
At home, in church and school.
Then, soon will come to bless the earth
The grand millennium,
When happiness and sweet content
Into each heart will come.

Newfoundland's Governor.

Sir William Macgregor, governor of Newfoundland, is one of the most notable men of the British colonies, both physically and intellectually; and, indeed, his health has contributed in no small degree to impress the savages, over whom he has been called upon to rule in the past, with a sense of the power of the British empire. He is the first colonial governor to wear the Victoria cross, which is the civilian equivalent of the Victoria cross. He received it for the heroic rescue of the crew and passengers of the steamship Clan Macgillivray, when it was wrecked at the foot of a lofty precipice near Suva, the capital of the Fiji Islands.

THE RETORT OF THE RUSSIAN.

Said the Russian: "No one ever saw me
In a town with such a name as Be-o-wa-wee,
Dil-ler-i-ca, or Chac-a-hou-la,
Ko-ke-bo-na, or Wal-lu-la,
Which are in that wild America. And look!
Here's Oo-heye-dan, Chine-o-teague and Schazh-ti-coke.
Isn't it a mighty lucky thing for us
We have no names like Ag-a-men-ti-cus,

Or Choc-co-loc-co, Ala.,
Cheek-to-wa-ga, Auch-in-closs, or Al-ex-an-ken,
Cod-de-back-ville, Me-hoop-an-y or Wee-haw-ken?
If we held An-as-a-gun-ti-cook in Me.,
With the Japs at Met-a-bet-chou-an in Que.,
I rather think 'twould threaten us
With geographic tetanus!
Or if they were down at Wax-a-hach-ie, Tex.,
And we fell back to Ixc-a-quixt-la, Mex.!
Wouldn't correspondents jeer us with a will.
If we had a town called Ap-to-kis-ic, Ill.?

Whale Flesh or Beef?

Whale meat at from three to six cents a pound is to be the solution of the meat trust question, according to some Newfoundland speculators who are seeking to make a market for whale meat.

It is declared that the flesh is finer flavored than beef, more nearly suggesting venison, and is capable of being prepared in a variety of ways.

Whales are not to be found in this part of the globe in sufficient numbers to make a serious inroad into the sale of beef, but it is declared by the promoters that they have already built up a successful trade in whale meat with the West Indies, and that they shortly intend placing it upon the London market.

It is to be shipped in special steamers, and even at a price of six cents a pound will return a handsome profit, while the cheaper cuts may be retailed for half that sum.

The largest flour mill in the British empire is in Montreal. It turns out 5,000 barrels of flour a day.

The Color of Gold.

The idea that gold varies somewhat in color, according to the locality in which it is found, is widely prevalent even among miners and money-changers and handlers in the gold-producing districts, but such notion is, on the authority of experts at the Philadephia mint, wholly erroneous.

Pure gold—that is, gold without any alloy or other impurity—is of one unvarying color. Few people, however, see such gold. All the gold of commerce used either as money or for jewelry has alloy in it after it is manufactured into the desired article. Even the nugget of gold, which is sometimes quite pure, is covered with dirt and stains on the outside that conceal its true color, and all gold dust which is melted at the place of mining contains impurities which go into the bar.

This is the reason why Mexican gold, for instance, has a redder tinge than that of California, and the same is true whether it be a piece of money or of jewelry. The red tinge is caused by the presence of copper and the paler tinge by silver, and in the mints of the different countries the amount and kinds of alloy used differ sufficiently to give different tints to the money.

"His Excellency."

It was recently announced in the Moniteur Official that hereafter the president of France and the minister of state would be styled "excellencies." In his congratulations to President Roosevelt over the peace of Portsmouth President Loubet addressed the American chief executive as "His Excellency"—a title that always stirs Mr. Roosevelt's bile. The governor of Massachusetts is by constitutional degree "his excellency," but the president of the United States is not. He is simply "Mr. President," although Senator Hoar denied even the "Mr." and used to insist on addressing the chief executive as "President." President Loubet may prefer to be known as "his excellency," but nobody will achieve popularity at the White House or Sagamore Hill by addressing Mr. Roosevelt by that title.

Hereditary Fear in Animals.

People who drive to the Bronx zoo, New York, often wonder what causes the nervousness of their horses after they have looked at the animals and come out to drive home. It is the wild animal scent in their clothes. The same manifestations appear in the frightened horses of the country town when the cages of circus tigers, lions and panthers are near enough for them to get the smell. All dangerous wild animals have a strong odor. In times of excitement this odor is emitted so excessively as to be almost sickening. Even in the best zoological gardens and menageries the smell of the animals cannot be avoided.

Simplon Tunnel.

Although the Simplon tunnel is so much longer than either the St. Gothard or the Mount Cenis, it was completed in six and a half years, while it took eight years to construct the St. Gothard and twelve years for the Mont Cenis. The difference in favor of the Simplon was due almost entirely to the improved rotating drills now used in tunnel construction.

An Epidemic of Hammers.

With reference to the recent closing of Stonehenge to the public, Sir Edmund Antrobus, the owner, entered a shop in Salisbury, where dozens of small hammers were on sale. Asking an explanation, he was assured by the shopkeeper that people bought the hammers in order to chip off souvenirs from the ancient Druidical stones.

WORKING WOMEN

Their Hard Struggle Made Easier—Interesting Statements by a Young Lady in Boston and One in Nashville, Tenn.

All women work; some in their homes, some in church, and some in the whirl of society. And in stores, mills and shops tens of thousands are on the never-ceasing treadmill, earning their daily bread.

All are subject to the same physical laws; all suffer alike from the same physical disturbance, and the nature of their duties, in many cases, quickly drifts them into the horrors of all kinds of female complaints, ovarian troubles, ulceration, falling and displacements of the womb, leucorrhœa, or perhaps irregularity or suppression of "monthly periods," causing backache, nervousness, irritability and lassitude.

Women who stand on their feet all day are more susceptible to these troubles than others.

They especially require an invigorating, sustaining medicine which will strengthen the female organism and enable them to bear easily the fatigues of the day, to sleep well at night, and to rise refreshed and cheerful.

How distressing to see a woman struggling to earn a livelihood or perform her household duties when her back and head are aching, she is so tired she can hardly drag about or stand up, and every movement causes pain, the origin of which is due to some derangement of the female organism.

Miss F. Orser of 14 Warrenton Street, Boston, tells women how to avoid such suffering; she writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—
"I suffered misery for several years with irregular menstruation. My back ached; I had bearing down pains, and frequent headaches; I could not sleep and could hardly drag around. I consulted two physicians without relief, and as a last resort, I tried Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and to my surprise, every ache and pain left me. I gained ten pounds and am in perfect health."

Miss Pearl Ackers of 327 North Summer Street, Nashville, Tenn., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—
"I suffered with painful periods, severe backache, bearing-down pains, pains across the abdomen; was very nervous and irritable, and my trouble grew worse every month.
"My physician failed to help me and I decided to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I soon found it was doing me good. All my pains and aches disappeared, and I no longer fear my monthly periods."

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the unfailing cure for all these troubles. It strengthens the proper muscles, and displacement with all its horrors will no more crush you.

Backache, dizziness, fainting, bearing down pains, disordered stomach, moodiness, dislike of friends and society—all symptoms of the one cause—will be quickly dispelled, and it will make you strong and well.

You can tell the story of your sufferings to a woman, and receive helpful advice free of cost. Address Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass.

RESTORED HIS HAIR

Scalp Humor Cured by Cuticura Soap and Ointment After All Else Failed.

"I was troubled with a severe scalp humor and loss of hair that gave me a great deal of annoyance. After unsuccessful efforts with many remedies and so-called hair tonics, a friend induced me to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment. The humor was cured in a short time, my hair was restored as healthy as ever, and I can gladly say I have since been entirely free from any further annoyance. I shall always use Cuticura Soap, and I keep the Ointment on hand to use as a dressing for the hair and scalp. (Signed) Fred'k Busche, 213 East 57th St., N. Y. City."

Invents New Life Raft.

Mr. Matson, chief steward of a steamer of the New York and New Haven line, has invented a life boat which gives promise of being useful. This boat is 12x9x8 feet, is water tight, with compartments for food and fresh water. It rests upon the decks on a platform, the latter being supported by uprights kept in proper position by pins. By pulling the lever chain the lever turns, the platform is tilted and the raft glides into the water. At its first trial twenty-five men were lowered into the raft by an automatic pulley, and in five minutes after reaching the water the raft left the side of the steamer.

INFANTILE PARALYSIS.

The subject of infantile paralysis will interest a much larger class of readers than one might at first expect. To walk along the streets of a city and see the poor deformed creatures who go through life with a shriveled limb, or perhaps an arm as well as a leg, always causes an involuntary feeling of pity to come over even the most careless and thoughtless. When one realizes at the same time that much of the trouble might have been overcome under proper treatment while the sufferer was still young, the sympathy for the unfortunate is mingled with resentment against those who had the care of the case or even against the parents for not making more strenuous efforts to correct the weakness.

Ignorance, yes, plain language I admit, but a fact nevertheless, and I trust that it may be no longer the plea. Many cases of infantile paralysis, yes, the majority of them, arise from over-feeding, indigestion and constipation. Of the three causes or combination of causes, that of constipation is the greatest factor. As I stated in previous articles, constipation as it should be considered is not alone a torpid condition of the bowels, but consists of inactivity in all of the organs of elimination, liver, kidneys and sweat glands of the skin. All of the waste or refuse matter of the system must be eliminated or a poisoning of the blood follows—auto intoxication. Perhaps I need not say much more about that part of it. Health Culture for August has an excellent article upon that subject.

To prevent infantile paralysis be certain that your children have good, wholesome food, and that they masticate it well. Allow them no liquids of any kind while partaking of food that should be thoroughly chewed. See that they drink plenty of pure water between meals and have fresh fruits as often as possible and plenty of it. Then constipation is not at all likely to trouble them.

If the condition already exists, see that these matters are attended to at once and in addition to the proper diet and other rules to observe, see that the child has proper treatment from the most skilful osteopath or Swedish movement manipulator that you can secure, yourself applying the hot and cold water treatments that have been described in the lectures on Hydrotherapy.

I shall not soon forget Bessie, a little girl that was brought to me several years ago. The right arm and leg were almost useless. I treated her according to the Home Health Club methods for only about four weeks. But the mother, who was an unusually bright and intelligent woman, carefully watched every movement and noted everything that was done. I took pains to show her not only the reason for each step in the treatment, but just how and when it should be given. There was rapid improvement from the start, and after the return home the treatments were continued for about a year, when all trace of lameness had disappeared and Bessie was the strongest and heartiest girl of her age in the neighborhood.

Plain common-sense and persistence in the proper treatment has made Bessie a strong, healthy woman, while the let alone policy would have found her to-day a disfigured cripple with no hope for relief.

Watch the babies and keep their stomachs and bowels clean as well as their bodies and clothing and infantile paralysis will not trouble your children.

CLUB NOTES.

Mt. Morris.

Dr. David H. Reeder, Laporte, Ind.:

Dear Sir—I have become very much interested in reading your health notes in this paper, and wish to write you regarding a stomach trouble.

I suffer a great deal with gas and bloating. The gas is terrible at night, and some days I am so bloated that I get dizzy. When the stomach is empty I have a burning pain in it and pain high up under my shoulders. Bowels are nearly always constipated. Urine is acid and causes a burning sensation when passed. It is also very scanty. I cannot eat any kind of fruit or berries or anything acid. Have headache on awakening in morning over eyes and top of head and every nerve seems to throb. I am quite fleshy. Will be thankful for any advice which you may give. Respectfully,

MRS. N. S.

If you will adopt the Home Health Club method of reducing the fat, which is a disease of digestion, you will cure all of the difficulties or disorders which you have enumerated. I would also suggest that you practice thorough flushing of the colon until the effect of the treatment for obesity or excessive fat is noticeable. Then you should take cold sitz baths at least every other night until the constipation is cured.

How to reduce the flesh and at the same time grow stronger was fully described not long ago by one of the Home Health Club members who reduced from 200 pounds to 160 pounds in three months and from being almost helpless and a burden to herself and family was able to do all of her own housework and all this without starvation or a drop of medicine. Turn back to the files of your paper and read her letter, also the lecture.

Phillipsburg.

Dr. David H. Reeder, Laporte, Ind.:

Dear Doctor—I am a subscriber to this paper and would not part with it for anything. I would like to ask you a few questions pertaining to the health of my mother. She suffers terribly with pain in the back and left side to the hips. If she walks a good deal her legs will stiffen, especially the left. Her age is fifty-five years. Yours respectfully, W. L.

Lumbago, or more properly speaking, uric acid, the origin of nearly all rheumatic pains, is probably the cause of your mother's suffering.

The following home treatment will give relief. First rub the back where the seat of the pain is located quite thoroughly with warm olive oil. Then saturate a double thickness of flannel in good strong vinegar that has been well heated. A little salt added to the vinegar will aid. Lay the hot cloth upon the back and over that place an oil cloth or oiled silk so that the moisture will not evaporate, and on top of the oiled silk or oil cloth place a good sized hot water bag. Keep it hot for an hour. Remove all the applications and again rub with the warm olive oil, using care to leave no oil on the surface. Finish the rubbing with witch hazel extract and cover with dry flannel. A repetition of this treatment for two or three evenings will usually cure the most obstinate cases of lumbago or pain in the back.

Dauphin.

Dr. David H. Reeder, Laporte, Ind.:

Dear Sir—I am an interested reader of your Home Health Club lectures and I wish to ask you how enlarged tonsils can be removed. I was told by our doctor to have them cut out, but do not like the thought of it. Kindly let me know what to do as soon as possible, and I will be more than thankful. Respectfully, H. K.

It is unnecessary to have the tonsils cut out. You can cure them yourself by the home treatment of which I have written you privately. You should also practice the exercises for the cure of catarrh and bronchial troubles.

Fulton.

Dr. David H. Reeder, Laporte, Ind.:

Dear Doctor—I am a reader of this publication, and I see the offer of your free advice to its readers.

I have a son eight years old who is, I believe, troubled with catarrh and also enlarged tonsils. He does not seem to have any trouble with his breathing while awake, but at night his nostrils seems to stop up, and while asleep throws his head far back. His general health is good, and always has been, with the exception of three years ago he had a stroke of infantile paralysis, which left him partially paralyzed in his left foot. Any advice would be very much appreciated. Respectfully yours, A. A.

While most people would consider this case almost identical with that of H. K., of Dauphin, yet the fact that the greatest difficulty is experienced while lying down would indicate a growth in the nostrils or polypus, a sort of sack or bag of the mucous membrane caused by weakened tissues, originating perhaps in the catarrh. If, as you suggest, the cause is wholly one of catarrh, it could be cured by the use of the method described in the Home Health Club Book of Lectures. But I suspect that it is not wholly due to catarrh, but, as I stated before, to polypus. In order to cure this, it is necessary to supply an element to the system which is lacking, and which causes the weakness of the mucous membranes. This can be done by the use of the tissue elements or cell salts, although the usual method of treatment is to cauterize or snare and pull them out, a practice which I consider brutal and unwarranted. Supply the lacking tissue elements, either through the food or direct, and a cure will follow.

In regard to the lameness of his left foot you should carefully read to-day's lecture and follow the directions therein given, and I believe the lameness will disappear.

All readers of this publication are at liberty to write for any information pertaining to the subject of health. Address all communications to the Home Health Club, or to Dr. David H. Reeder, Laporte, Ind., with name and address in full and with at least four cents in postage.

On the List.

On one of the old turnpikes yet remaining in the South a big touring car had twice rushed through the gate without paying toll. The third time they made the attempt the tollman shut his gate, and brought them to a stand. With indignation the half dozen occupants of the car declared they were entitled to ride free.

"Look at your own board," said the spokesman. "It says, 'Every carriage, cart or wagon drawn by one beast, 2 cents; every additional beast, 2 cents.' We're not drawn by any beast at all."

"No; but here's where ye come in, sah," replied the guard of the highway, pointing to another clause, as follows: "Every half dozen hogs, 4 cents. An' three times four is twelve," he added.

The twelve cents was paid.—Harper's Weekly.

Voluntary Imposition.

General Sherman once had occasion to stop at a country home where a tin basin and a roller towel on the back porch sufficed for the family's ablutions. For two mornings the small boy of the household watched in silence the visitor's efforts at making a toilet under the unfavorable auspices, but when on the third day the toothbrush, nail file, whisk broom, etc., had been duly used and returned to their places in the traveler's grip he could suppress his curiosity no longer, so boldly put the question: "Say, mister, air you always that much trouble to yo'se'f?"—Lippincott's.

SERIES OF SENSATIONS

Three Deaths in One Town in Illinois are Shrowded in Mystery.

ONE VICTIM WAS A WOMAN.

Attorney Refuses to Prosecute Cases Because the Men Charged With Murder Are His Friends.

Chicago, Ill.—Details of a series of sensations which are alleged to have smoldered for months in Cambridge, Ill., and which may explain the mysterious death of John V. Steed, a prominent attorney and politician, who was found lifeless at his office door in Cambridge a week ago with a bullet through his head, have been revealed here.

Dr. Byrd C. Powell, a veterinary surgeon living in Sandwich, Ill., came to Chicago and told a story back of the recent suicide of his brother, William D. Powell, of Cambridge. The story discloses a chain of facts connecting the Powell and Streed case with the virtual murderer of a Swedish domestic in the home of a wealthy man in Cambridge more than five years ago. She was buried secretly without a death certificate or inquest.

Because They Knew the Truth.

In the opinion of Dr. Powell, Attorney Streed was murdered because Streed knew the truth behind the woman's death. Streed got the facts from William D. Powell, who committed suicide August 26 last, after William Powell's home had been broken up and the guilty persons shielded, it is alleged, by an influential political friend. Dr. Powell declares that his brother was driven to his death by a clique in Cambridge.

It is said Powell went to Cambridge to live about the time of the death of the domestic, the facts of which he learned accidentally. His own domestic life was unhappy. He suspected several men of prominence of being too friendly with his wife, and encountered as a result persecution, which it is said drove him to suicide.

First stories detrimental to Powell's business were circulated. Then the crowd made it their business to offend him on the streets. Men came to him at unexpected hours day and night to his home and to his office and told him he had better leave town. He refused to be intimidated.

Then Comes the Climax.

Finally came a climax. Powell awoke one morning to find "tar and feathers" written on his door, with a note ordering him to leave town within four days or suffer violence at the hands of a mob. Then Powell summoned his brother. They talked all night long, William detailing the story of his sufferings, of his love for his wife, the persecutions and the threat of death.

"What shall I do?" he asked in despair.

"Go after them," replied his adviser. "You know something of the death of this Swedish girl. The men persecuting you are involved in that case. Go after them."

Refused to Prosecute Friends.

Two detectives arrived in Cambridge as a result to work up evidence in reference to the death of the domestic. W. D. Powell took the evidence to Attorney Streed and asked him to prosecute the men. Streed refused to do it, because it involved some of his best friends. William D. Powell's suicide followed. W. D. Powell believes that Streed and some of the suspected men quarreled and in the heat of dispute Streed betrayed knowledge of the domestic's tragedy.

"My brother," said Dr. Powell, "was hounded to death by a clique of men who control everything in the administration of law in Cambridge. His knowledge of the girl's death, passing to Streed, shifted to the latter the fatal mark of that 'gang's' enmity. If Streed was murdered it is a simple matter for the Cambridge authorities to figure out who are the persons interested in bringing about his death. But they have purposely suppressed the truth, which if revealed may lead and bring to light another murder."

The fever summary is as follows: New cases, 8; total to date, 166; deaths, 1; total, 27. Cases discharged 61; under treatment, 78. One of the new cases is that of Miss Ruth Glenn, daughter of Rev. B. C. Glenn, pastor of the Palafox Street Methodist church.

VOL III. CLANTON, ALA., OCTOBER 12 1905 NO. 29

STATE HAPPENINGS

Of General and Local Interest as They Occur.

Convict Prison Burned.

Montgomery, Ala.—News of the total destruction of the convict prison of the Horse Shoe Company at River Falls Friday came to Judge J. M. Carmichael, president of the state board of convict inspectors, in a brief telegram from Maj. M A. Sparks, the warden at that point. The loss will be several thousand dollars.

The contract which the state has with the Horse Shoe Company guarantees the state against loss by fire and it will be sustained by the contractors. None of the convicts were killed or hurt in the fire. Seventy-five of them are being worked in the saw mill plant at that point.

These convicts for some time to come will be forced to camp out. Judge Carmichael and Hon. M. W. Camper, a member of the board, whose business it is to inspect these prisons, closed a contract soon after getting the information of the fire for forty mattresses and a sufficient number of ranges, which will be shipped to River Falls as quickly as possible.

While no details of the disaster are yet known to the convict board, it is the general belief that the prisoners were all at work when the fire started. Judge Carmichael expects complete information from the warden at River Falls in a written report.

The prison was built to accommodate twice as many convicts as are under hire to the saw mill concern at River Falls. It had every modern convenience that most of the prisons in Alabama have, and regret is expressed in all quarters that the jail was destroyed. There was a hospital ward, which went to ashes, too.

Four Young Men In Trouble.

Scottsboro, Ala.—Four young white men, giving their names as Dug Dillard, Pat Hall, Case Baster and Harry Jallion, were brought here by Sheriff Austin and placed in jail charged with larceny. A box car of the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis Railway was broken into at Bridgeport and several pairs of fine shoes taken from a case on Tuesday. These four men, being strangers in the town and claiming to hail from Chattanooga, were arrested on suspicion. The three were taken before Justices Henson and Finnimore charged with the offense and Jallion confessed, implicating the other three men. Their bonds were placed at $500 each, which they failed to execute, and were remanded to jail.

Engineers in Field.

Anniston, Ala.—Special Engineers French and A. W. Haskell, of Birmingham, were at Jacksonville recently looking into the inducements offered by that city toward getting the Seaboard Air Line Railway extended to Anniston via the Jacksonville route. The result of their findings is that the Seaboard proposes to have its road built and in operation between Jacksonville and this city within eighteen months of the date on which they are granted the right of way. J. D. Crow C. D. Martin and D. J. Privett, of Jacksonville, are at work securing the rights of way. They report that splendid success is attending their efforts, and believe the road will be in operation in less than two years without a doubt.

Stole Diamond Ring.

Birmingham, Ala.—The theft of a diamond ring from a prominent young society woman of Montgomery, a hasty trip of one of her admirers to Birmingham and back to the state capital in one day, and the discovery of the ring in a local pawnship, are some of the details say the police, of a case they have just unearthed. The description given by the pawnbroker tallied with the description of the young man who called at the girl's home on the eve of his departure from Montgomery, but to avoid disgracing the man's family, the police say, the father of the girl will not prosecute the case.

Suit Against Garry.

Birmingham, Ala.—E. R. McDavid, insurance commissioner of Alabama, has instructed Solicitor John McQueen to bring suit for $8,500 on behalf of the state against Robert Garry, a wholesale merchant of this city, whose store was recently destroyed by fire. It is alleged that Garry carried insurance with seventeen companies not qualified to do business in Alabama. The code of Alabama provides that any one placing insurance with companies not qualified must report the same to the insurance commissioner and pay 1 per cent of the gross premiums to the state. In case of loss one-half of 1 per cent of all amounts paid must be given to the state.

Wreck in Escambia.

Brewton, Ala.—A wreck occurred on the Cedar Creek Mill Company's log road, about twelve miles east of town. The wreck was caused by the track spreading, the engine and tender turning over. No one was dangerously injured, but the engineer, W. C. Darley, sustained painful bruises about the head, side and leg. The fireman escaped with very slight bruises. William Reiner, a drummer from Chicago, was also on the engine, and his left ankle was caught under the engine when it turned over, and it was two hours before he could be liberated.

Opera House Changes Hands.

Eufaula, Ala.—A recent deal in real estate here has caused the Morris Opera House to go into the hands of Messrs. Foy Bros. and John B. Whitlock, and it is highly probable that it will not be a great while before it will be restored to its former prestige. The new owners will open the opera house at an early date, and a current rumor is to the effect that this will be done some time about January 1. The building and the opera house will undergo some needed repairs later on, but nothing will be done in this line until next year. If the opera house is opened to theatricals at any time during this year it will be in its present condition.

Another Gas Well Comes In

Huntsville, Ala.—The sixth gas well of the New York and Alabama Company came in at Hazel Green a day or two ago with a pressure estimated at 150 pounds. The company now has six natural gas wells within two miles of each other in the locality of Hazel Green, their average pressure being about 135 pounds, and the supply is estimated to be enough to furnish every industry in Huntsville with cheap fuel. An Indiana corporation that now operates a pipe line in Indian will move its line to this field, it is stated, and the work will commence during this season.

Attempted Hold-Up.

Anniston, Ala.—While going home after attending the performance of the minstrels W. M. Hames, Jr., shipping clerk of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, was held up at the corner of Fourteenth and Noble streets by an unknown negro. The negro was hidden behind a tree in a dark spot near Mr. Hames' boarding house, and as Mr. Hames was passing the tree behind which the negro was standing, the would-be robber stepped in front of Mr. Hames and, covering him with a revolver, demanded his money. Mr. Hames was unarmed, and, believing the negro would not shoot for fear of detection and arrest, turned and ran toward town. He met a friend, and together they made a thorough search for the would-be highwayman, but the latter was not to be found, and as the hold-up had been committed in the dark, Mr. Hames was unable to furnish the police a description of the would-be highwayman.

Negro Hanged,

Birmingham, Ala.—After confessing that he was implicated in the murder of E. G. Almon, flagman on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, and after furnishing the police with information that lead to the arrest and conviction of two others, Wesley Hale, a negro, went to the gallows Friday morning protesting his innocence. The condemned negro refused to make a talk from the big steel frame which sent him into eternity, but his spiritual adviser, F. G. Ragland, a negro Baptist preacher, said that Hale wanted his farewell message to be that he was innocent. After the preacher finished a noose was adjusted around the negro's neck, the black cap placed over his head, and the trigger sprung at 10:43. Sixteen minutes later later the physicians pronounced him dead. The hanging took place in the yard of the Jefferson county jail and was witnessed by an unusually small crowd.

$100,000 IS GONE.

Clerk of Adams Express in Pittsburg is Also Missing —Warrant Issued.

MAN BIDS HIS FAMILY GOODBYE.

Pittsburg Bank Had Sent Package Containing $100,000 in Currency to Express Office.

Pittsburg, Pa.—All the machinery built expressly for the detection of criminals will be set in motion here for the purpose of capturing Edward George Cuncliffe, suspected of robbing the Adams Express Company of $101,000.

Cuncliffe, who was acting money clerk Saturday, receipted for a package containing $100,000 consigned by a Pittsburg bank to a bank in Cincinnati. Tuesday when the office was opened for business, Cuncliffe was not at his desk. No reason for his absence being known, his department was investigated. It was quickly learned that $1,000 of the company's funds entrusted to Cuncliffe was missing. Detectives were called in at once, and the fact developed that the $100,000 package had disappeared also. Cuncliffe was sought at his home, but he had not been there since Monday evening. Mrs. Cuncliffe, when told that her husband was missing and was suspected of taking a large sum of money, became hysterical and is in a serious condition. Her four little children are being cared for by relatives.

Up to midnight not the slightest trace of the fugitive has been discovered.

Statement Is Issued.

The following official statement of the affair is given for publication:

"At 4:15 p. m. Monday, October 9, a bank of Pittsburg, Pa., delivered to the Adams Express Company, at their office at 610 Wood street, a package of currency containing $100,000. Of this amount $80,000 was in $100 bills, $10,000 in $50 bills, and the remainder, $10,000, in $5, $10 and $20 bills. The $100 and the $50 bills issue of the Farmers' Deposit National bank of Pittsburg, Pa., and the Bank of Pittsburg, N. A., were in the main entirely new; some had been slightly used. The $5, $10 and $20 bills were old currency. The package containing this large sum of money was consigned to a bank in Cincinnati, O.

"This package was received and receipted for by Edward George Cuncliffe, who was then acting in the place of the regular money clerk, who was ill.

Money Is Found Missing.

"Cuncliffe left the office at the usual time Monday evening and Tuesday morning when he failed to report for duty a hurried examination was made of his department, and it was learned that about $1,000 of funds entrusted to his care were missing. General Agent Hyner, of the Adams Express Company, immediately called in detectives and placed the matter in their hands. Later developments brought to light the fact that in addition to $1,000 missing the bank package containing the $100,000 had not been received at the money forwarding office at Union station, this city.

Bade His Family Goodbye.

"Inquiries made at his residence, 214 Lucerne street, West End, Pittsburg, showed that Cuncliffe arrived home at the customary time, and after changing his clothes, bade his family goodbye, saying to his wife that he was going out for the evening, and nothing further has been heard of him.

"Cuncliffe has been employed by the Adams Express Company since March 1, 1904. Previous to that time he was employed in the Pittsburg service of the American Express Company and the United States Express Company, of Hartford, Conn., and bore a good reputation. He was methodical, accurate and an excellent clerk.

"Edward George Cuncliffe is described as 35 years of age, looks to be 40; 5 feet 7 inches tall; weighs 175 pounds; medium build; dark-brown hair, heavily mixed with gray; wears a heavy, short-cropped moustache, dark and partly mixed with gray; could raise a very heavy beard; has blue eyes. When last seen he wore dark-blue, double-breasted sack suit, a black derby hat, turned collar and a black bow tie. He wears a silver ring with an acorn. He is an inveterate cigarette smoker and the second finger of his right hand is badly discolored with nicotine. Cuncliffe is afflicted with what is known as the 'cigarette cough.'

"A warrant has been issued charging Cuncliffe with larceny."

YELLOW FEVER NEWS.

The Latest Reports From the Infected District.

New Orleans, La.—The yellow fever report for this city for the last twenty-four hours is as follows: New cases, 19; total cases, 3,195; deaths, none; total deaths, 410; new foci, 4; cases under treatment, 200; cases discharged, 2,585.

The gratifying feature about the Sunday report is the fact that no deaths occurred. This is the second time during the present visitation that a day has passed without a death from yellow fever, the previous day being September 11. A foot note to the official report says that Mrs. John Duffy died Friday, and the doctor's certificate, given Saturday, showed the cause of death to be congestion of the brain. This case had been diagnosed as yellow fever on October 5 by a marine hospital surgeon, and it is the basis for the second charge of failing to report a case which has been made against Dr. Szabary.

Among the new cases is a reporter on an afternoon paper, whose brother was stricken two days ago. Only six of the cases are above Canal street, which is the larger portion than has been noted in a month.

The several people from Rosetta, Miss., who voluntarily went into detention at the Emergency hospital, are still in good health, and Mr. Tellery, head of the family which first entered the hospital, said he wished to say to the people outside that he was being most satisfactorily treated; that he was comfortable, and that all members of his family were enjoying the best of health.

Few Country Reports.

Very few reports were received from the country by the state board of health.

Dr. Brady, the medical inspector, submitted a very interesting report on the situation in St. Tammany parish, where he made a thorough investigation of the infection. He traces the infection in Covington and Abita Springs to New Orleans, but says that in one place secondary infection is in evidence, and in the other, tertiary infection is due.

Following are the country reports:

Alexandria, 1 death.

Gretna, 1 new case, brought from Grand Island.

Union plantation, in Jefferson parish, several cases.

Mississippi:

Port Gibson, 1 new case, 1 death.

No new cases on Gulf coast, or at Rosetta.

The fever reported from Homeo Chitto, near Rosetta, as yellow, has been pronounced malaria.

At Natchez.

Natchez, Miss.—Five new cases of yellow fever were reported, of which four are white. A new focus developed at a country home just beyond the southeastern corner of the city limits. President Charles W. Miller, of the Promotive League, turned the relief work over to a relief association organized today.

The relief funds amount to $2,500.

Summary of official yellow fever report:

New cases 5; new foci, 1; cases under treatment, 33; total foci, 480; total cases to date, 136; cases discharged, 1; total deaths, 7.

Public Speaking.

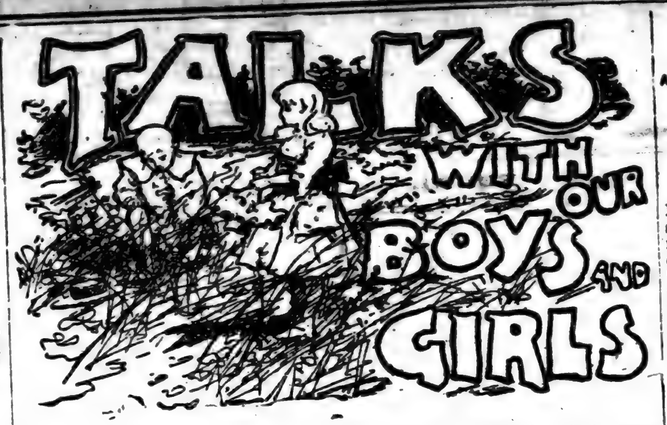
By Lady Henry Somerset.

PUBLIC speaking is not a thing that can be done haphazard, without any thought. It means work; you cannot do it unless you take pains.

Keep in mind what you are pledged to accomplish.
Never speak unless you expect a definite result.
Never apologize for being present or for speaking.
Arrange your ideas so that your audience can follow your argument.
Keep your best point until last.
A good plan is to speak your speeches to yourself.
Let your first sentence arrest attention.
Do not hurry your words. Learn how to finish your sentences. Remember the end is just as important as the beginning.
Be careful with your conversation.
Be certain of your facts.
Be careful about anecdotes.
Beware of tricks. Don't be like automatic figures.
Hold yourself upright—hold yourself as if you were going to sing, and you will be heard anywhere.
Be natural, gentle, and restful.
If you feel things, your audience will feel them too.
Have something to say, and say it from the heart.

"Yankee Doodle" an Irish Jig.

Mr. W. H. Grattan Flood writes: Will you allow me to point out to you that the tune of "Yankee Doodle" is an old Irish jig of the early eighteenth century, well known in Ireland still as "All the Way to Galway?" Your statement that it was composed by Dr. Schuckburgh is a slip. You probably meant that he wrote the doggerel words, which is generally admitted, but he merely adapted his verses to the Irish jig, which was printed as "Yankee Doodle" in 1782, and was subsequently introduced by Arnold into his "Two to One."—London Truth.



A "BUMBLE."

Bumble, Bumble—fuss and grumble,
Bang your head against the vine!
Why should you begin to grumble
When on jumbles you shall dine?
Bumble! Bumble! see him stumble!
As he buzzes near the sweet,
Half expecting that he'll tumble
'Fore he gets enough to eat.
Bumble, Bumble, he's not humble,
For he's boasting of his pow'r.
Hear him mumble, rumble, drumble,
As he fumbles round each flower.
Bumble, Bumble, honey crumble,
Oh, you dumble, drumble-drone!
Would you, like the painter, scrumble
Every color but your own?

JUGGLING FOR EXERCISE.

That the easiest and pleasantest way to keep in "fit" condition is to practice juggling—the art of balancing and catching objects—is the argument ingeniously maintained in Pearson's Weekly, of London, by one of the world's most famous jugglers. Physical exercises, he says, are apt to become monotonous; in juggling, however, there is always something novel to be done. "If you should live to be as old as Methuselah you would never exhaust the possibilities of a ball and a stick."

When exercising at home, unwatched by a teacher, one is liable to perform his exercises in an incorrect or slovenly fashion, thus doing himself more harm than good, but the simplest feat of juggling can be done in only one way—the right way. Again, where a physical exercise develops only a certain part, or parts, of the body, five minutes' juggling calls into play every important muscle. Finally, few physical exercises train the eye or the hand. Juggling trains both.

The mistake most boys make is that after seeing a professional, they go home and try to do offhand a feat that it requires years of practice to accomplish. Begin with the simplest feats, such as balancing a walking-stick on your forehead, or tossing a ball from behind your back over your shoulder and catching it as it falls. If you are really fond of juggling you will invent your own problems.

Here are a few axioms: It is easier to balance a thing on your head than on your hand.

Up to the point where great physical strength is required, the larger the object the easier it is to balance; thus it is easier to balance a walking-stick on your forehead than it is a pencil.

Always look at the top of whatever you are balancing; beginners make the mistake of looking at the bottom or middle of the stick, or whatever it is. Again, when catching things do not watch your hands. Keep your eye on the object, just as you would to catch a batted ball.

In the balancing feats remember that the shape of the article is immaterial. What you have to do is to balance an imaginary line passing vertically through the centre of gravity of the object, or, briefly, to keep its axis perpendicular to whatever it is balanced upon.

Finally, juggling is the best and healthiest of indoor exercise because it never wearies; it develops every part of the body; it trains the hand and eye; it makes for grace and freedom of movement, and a liking for it is a more effectual safeguard against the temptations of drink or excess of any kind than almost any other thing that can be named.

THE BOY AND THE RUSKS.

Young Ted was most fastidious about his eating. He was the only one his mother had to cook for, and the good woman was driven nearly to the point of distraction trying to suit the child.

One day he sat all morning in his room reading and nibbling peanuts. When he came to the lunch table he found that his mother had baked a large pan of rusk, hoping to please him. But he felt peevish and declared they were dry and that he couldn't swallow them.

In the afternoon the washerwoman's boy came to bring a few belated clothes. The lady wrapped up the rusks and sent them to the washerwoman, knowing that she had many hungry mouths to feed.

At the front gate the washerwoman's boy met the boy of the house. "The fellers are goin' to play football this afternoon," said the washerwoman's boy. The elder boy inquired where, and was off to join the game. He ran and tumbled around all the rest of the day.

On his way home the washerwoman's boy joined him, and when they got to the latter's gate the washerwoman's boy said: "Come in, and see if ma has anything to eat." They went in and ma stopped ironing to give them each a couple of rusks. When the boy reached his own home he declared: "Mother, I had some dandy rusk today, at the washerwoman's house. I wish you'd get her to teach you how to make them." Do you wonder that his mother laughed? —Philadelphia Record.

CASTAWAY.

In Lewis, Delaware, they tell of a dog which used its eyes to good advantage. A large schooner, bound from Maine to Philadelphia, lay on her side, fast sinking in the bay. The cargo had listed suddenly, while a heavy sea was on, and the life-saving crew feared that the vessel would go down before help could be rendered.

All hands set to work and soon the breeches buoy shot out over the angry gray waters and landed on the schooner's deck. One by one the people on board the schooner were brought ashore—first the captain's wife, then the crew and lastly the captain himself. Judge how the people must have felt then, when looking out over the breakers to the ship they saw a fine large collie dog standing on the deck of the sinking craft, and lifting up his voice in a pitiful cry, which now and then the gale carried to their ears.

The captain's wife begged the life savers to send the breeches out again for the dog. They look incredulous, but she declared she knew he would get into them. A trial was made, and sure enough, the sagacious beast lifted his stiff hind legs into the breeches, and holding fast with his teeth, came safely to land. As the captain's wife threw her arms about the dog's neck and wept for joy, the vessel gave a lurch and was seen no more.

BEE CHARIOTS.

There is a tiny insect which knows enough to enjoy a more delightful ride than we could have on the best horse or in the most perfect automobile which ever spun along in the park. This little insect is a mere dot, yet with no one to teach it, it waits by a stone or a plant until a bee comes along. Then it leaps on the bee's back and off it goes through the sunlit air for its morning ride.

It goes on till it gets tired, then, watching its chance, tumbles off to some convenient flower. When rested it takes another ride. It finally is taken by the helpless bee to the hive. Here the little parasite is attracted by the comfortable quarters and abundant store of food. It jumps off the bee's back and takes a nap among the bee eggs.

When it wakes from its nap it is very hungry, and devours not only the bee bread prepared for the bee's baby, but makes a meal of the baby itself! However, it is repaid for its idleness and gluttony, for when it at last gets out of the bee house it is no longer a sprightly, agile mite, but a fat, floundering beetle, hardly able to get out of anybody's way. If on the garden path you find a blue bug which drops oil from its joints when you pick it up, you may be sure it was once a saucy thing which stole rides and ate up bee breakfasts and bee babies.

Causes and Cure of Nervousness.

There are five causes of nervousness:

(a) Low vitality of the nervous system.

(b) The faculties of self-mastery being weak.

(c) Loss of sleep.

(d) The use of improper foods and drinks.

(e) Association with erratic, excitable, nervous, idiotic, insane, cynical and pessimistic people.

When the life force is constantly leaving the body at the finger tips, at the feet, through the eyes, at the knees, at the hands and at the elbows, a person becomes nervous. In order to overcome these losses a person should learn to control every movement. A restless foot, an uneasy eye, a swinging leg, involuntary motions, a trembling voice, an uneasy step, jerky actions, anger, irritability, pessimism, sudden starts, etc., are signs of nervousness. Unless a person develops his faculties of self-mastery, unless he increase vitality of the nervous system, unless he gets the sleep which is necessary each and every day, unless he eats the right kind of foods and drinks the right kind of drinks, and unless he associates with the right kind of people, he will become more nervous; lastly, he will become a physical and mental wreck; he will become old looking and haggard; he will die before his time.—Human Culture.

Real destitution is rarely seen in Japan. Though some of its inhabitants are very poor, yet all seem to be fairly well fed.

THE PULPIT.

A SCHOLARLY SUNDAY SERMON BY DR. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS.

Subject: The Compassion of Christ.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Dr. Louis Albert Banks, at one time pastor of the Hanson Place M. E. Church, where he was most successful, preached there Sunday morning on "The Christ Who is Touched With the Feeling of Our Infirmities." The text was from Hebrews iv:15. "We have not a high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin." Dr. Banks said:

"The last part of this text explains the first. Christ is in sensitive touch with us in the temptations and trials of life because He has personally experienced them. He is not a stranger standing off on the ramparts of heaven, looking down, though it be ever so benevolently, upon sorrows and difficulties which He has never personally known. Such compassion could not mean much to us. But Jesus Christ perfected Himself as the captain of our salvation through suffering. For three and thirty years He wore our flesh, and tasted our grief, and He is touched with the feeling of our infirmities. How much that ought to mean to us. When we are in any trial or trouble, and we need comfort, it is not to the most joyous and happy, who have never known what sorrow was, to whom we go for sympathy.

"Some years ago I was surprised to receive from a very rich man in a city where I was then pastor a check for a large sum of money which he said he wished me to use among the poor in my part of the city, and especially among children who were having a hard time of it. I followed his directions and gave him an account of how portions of it were used. Still other sums followed until I was very much interested in the matter, and wondered not a little at the cause of it. After it had gone on for nearly a year I received a letter from him inviting me to take lunch with him at a hotel. When we met he said: 'I suppose you have wondered at my sending this money to you, an entire stranger to me, and at my being so much interested in the children of the poor in your section of the city. But this is how it comes. My father died when I was a very little boy. My mother was left a widow with a large family of children, all of whom were too small to be of much help. She had to work very hard, but work as hard as she could, she was unable to procure enough food and clothing to give us comfort all the time. For two or three years I knew what it was to be hungry. Many a night I have cried myself to sleep in silence lest my mother should hear and it should make her feel bad, because I was so hungry. I could not keep back the tears, and I knew she had no bread to give me. You would scarcely believe it,' continued the millionaire, 'looking at me now and knowing what you do of me that on more than one occasion I have run and snatched a crust of bread thrown away from a wagon where some teamster had eaten his lunch, and rescued it from a dog, and sat down and ate it gratefully, and washed it down with a drink from the town pump.' Then the tears came into the big man's eye and one rolled out on his cheek as he said: 'Now you know why I have so much sympathy for the poor children. It makes me shiver on a cold night when I think of the boys and girls who have not clothing enough to keep them warm. For I have been in their place, and I know how it feels. I know how a boy feels when he is hungry and cold, and, God helping me, I shall never lose a chance to help a boy or a girl that is in a hard place.'

"As I listened to this big-hearted man there came into my mind the Scripture we are studying. He was able to sympathize with and comfort others, because he had a fellow feeling with their infirmities and their sorrows.

"So, no one could be a Savior for us who had not suffered. No one could have compassion on us in our weaknesses who had not himself been tempted and tried as by fire. Only a man who has been hungry, and has not known where to lay his head at times, knows how to sympathize with others who are in similar experience. Only he who has been in the wilderness with the devil, tempted on every side, struggling for his life, knows how to sympathize and have true compassion with tempted men and women to-day. Only He who has been crowned with thorns, who has been spit upon and whipped with the scourge, who has fainted under His cross, knows real compassion, knows how to be touched with the feeling of people who are lashed by cruel misfortune and who are fainting under burdens too heavy for their shoulders. But Jesus Christ meets all these requirements. He knows all about it.

"The incarnation of Jesus was no sham. He wore our humanity completely, and there never was a more perfectly sensitive human nature, one more tender and exquisite in human feelings than that of Jesus Christ. As has been well said, Christ affected none of that hard indifference in which some ancient philosophers vainly gloried. He felt as a man, and He sympathized with the feelings of others. On different occasions we are informed that He was troubled in spirit, that He groaned, and that He wept. The story of His agony in the Garden of Gethsemane exhibits a striking picture of the sensations of innocent nature oppressed with anguish. It discovers all the conflict between the dread of suffering on the one hand, and the sense of duty on the other; the man struggling for a while with human weakness, and in the end rising superior and winning victory. We hear the Savior say, 'Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me.' There is the dread of suffering natural on all our lips, but the next moment we hear Christ saying, 'Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt. Thy will be done.' So our Savior was touched with the feeling of our infirmities. He was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. His whole life was an experience of the ordinary trials and provocations that lead to evil, and these were sometimes aggravated into the most intense temptations. He was the target of all the arrows of [illegible] though He was tempted in all [illegible] like as we are. He came off [illegible] and without sin.

"These reflections bring [illegible] preciate the fact that [illegible] is [illegible] perfect as a friend [illegible] in the weaknesses and infirmities which our lives in this world are [illegible] miliar. We may comfort ourselves with the assurance of several inspiring reflections.

"First—Christ, being touched with the feeling of our infirmities, [illegible] make a distinction between what is weak and what is willfully wrong in us. Jesus gives us a very beautiful illustration of this in His treatment of the disciples, those three close friends, Peter and James and John, whom He took with Him into the Garden of Gethsemane on the night of His betrayal. He said to them as the burden of sorrow pressed upon Him, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death; tarry ye here and watch with Me.' And then He went away a little by Himself and fell on His knees in prayer, and after a while He came back, wishing the comfort of the presence of His friends. And behold, they were all asleep. They slumbered at His step, and Jesus said to Peter, 'What, could ye not watch with Me one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.' Then Jesus, in the tenderness of His great heart, [illegible] sympathy and compassion for them, begins to apologize for them, to explain to them that the weakness of the spirit indeed is willing. He says, 'But the flesh is weak.' Was there ever greater tenderness than that? We can easily imagine the sarcasm of Napoleon or Frederick the Great on an occasion like that. But [illegible] thing more clearly illustrates the tenderness of Christ in distinguishing between our weakness and willful wrong doing? We may be sure that God will never misjudge us if we are doing the best we can. He knows and appreciates it to its full [illegible] He sees every battle we make, and when we are defeated, and knows the motive behind every blow that is struck in His name. He will not reject or look with indifference on the tempt on any effort we make to [illegible] Him because of our infirmities will make us to blush. What we speak words are not the only prayers God hears, but every secret aspiration, longing for goodness or for [illegible] service is a prayer which He [illegible] and answers. There is no eloquence in human lips that can compare with the penitential tears shed in secret, springing from sincere meditation upon duty to God, and heartfelt longing that we may render Him truer service.

"Second—Jesus, knowing our infirmities, will not allow us to be burdened heavier than we are able to bear. He will not allow us to be tempted in such a way that there is no escape for us. He will not permit us to be tempted, unless we bring it on ourselves by our own sin, with unnecessary troubles. His measure about burdens is infinitely tender: 'Come unto Me, all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For My yoke is easy, and My burden is light.'

"And in regard to temptation, we have the direct promise that God's grace shall be sufficient for us, and that in every temptation He will provide a way for our escape, so that we may in our sorrows and in our temptations, Christ, touched with the feeling of our infirmities, stands ready to help, comfort and defend us. We shall never walk a path so lonely or uncertain but that we may find marks to show us, if we will really seek for them, that Christ has been over the way first. Alexander Maclaren recalls the customs of pioneers in trackless lands, how when one friend passes through pathless forests he breaks a branch every hundred yards as he goes, that those who follow after may see the traces of his footsteps, showing been there, and may know that they have not lost the trail. So we are journeying through the wilderness of night, and the dark woods of affliction and sorrow, it is a precious thing to find here and there a broken bough, or a leafy stem bent down with the tread of Christ's foot and the light and thoughtfulness of His hand as He passed, and to remember that the path He trod He has hallowed, and that there are lingering fragrances and hidden strengths in the remembrance that He was tempted in all points as we are, bearing grief for us, bearing grief with us, bearing grief [illegible]

"Third—As angels comforted Him in His sorrows, so He will succor us in our trials and weaknesses. The tenderly Jesus prayed for us when He offered Himself upon the cross an atonement for our sins! In the tender prayer in which He expressly states that it was not only for His disciples, but for all who should believe on Him through their words to the end of the world, and therefore includes us, the Savior prays: 'Now I am no more in the world: but these are in the world. Holy Father! Those Thou gavest them Me. were, and Thou them through Thine own name. Sanctify them through Thy truth. Keep them from the evil one, that they may be where I am, and may behold the glory which Thou hast given Me.' How tender Christ was to people in hard places during His earthly ministry! Recall His journey to [illegible] Martha and Mary when their brother Lazarus was dead. Remember His kindness to the poor woman who touched His garments as the crowd pressed about Him. Remember the woman who brought her box of precious ointment as He sat at the feast in the house of Simon, who washed His feet with her tears and wiped them with the hairs of her head. In all these, and in multitudes of other cases how conspicuous the tenderness and sensitive compassion of Christ in comforting those who were tried and troubled. Surely there could be nothing more attractive to us. Nothing which could more powerfully appeal to our confidence and to our faith than the character and the life of Jesus our Savior as set forth in the Word of God."

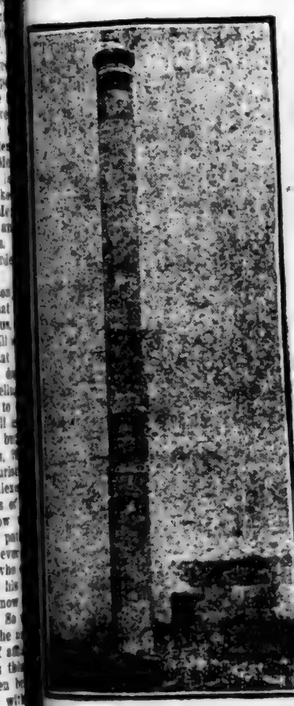
THE RECORD IN CHIMNEYS.

Highest in World Just Completed at Tacoma, Wash.

The tallest chimney in the world has just been completed at Tacoma, Wash. The stack is constructed entirely of concrete, strengthened by steel rods placed horizontally and longitudinally. The height of the chimney is 308 feet; inside diameter, 21 feet; largest outside diameter, 24 feet.

To the height of ninety feet it is built double, the outer shell being 24 inches thick and the inner four inches thick, with a five inch air space between the two shells. The single shell is seven inches thick and 218 feet high.

The chimney was constructed in twenty sections, and is reinforced throughout by a network of steel rods. The work was done from the inside, a scaffold being raised as the work progressed. All material was hoisted by means of a steel cable attached to the drum of the engine operating the concrete mixer.



His Heart In His Business.

Strange blends of mixtures occupy his shelves. Types of bewildering shape and [illegible] confusing history are displayed. Costly Accident for State.

The State of Massachusetts lost $3,000 because a man living near it left his window open over night. He was a silk grower and in the act of producing a new brand of worm experimented with some gipsy moths that had been sent to him from France. He left the moths under a screen by an open window one night, and the next morning they had disappeared. The shade had been overturned and the draft blew them into the street.

Eighteen months later Massachusetts was swarming with gipsy moths, and they ate the leaves off every tree and bush for miles around. The damage done in two years by the pests totaled $3,000,000, and the State authorities spent another $750,000 to exterminate the pests.

PLUMBER STRIKES IT RICH.

Excavating for Windmill Unearths a Potful of Gold Coins.

R. McKenney Price, the well known plumber and contractor of this city, has struck it rich in Virginia, says a dispatch from Salisbury, Md. A few weeks ago Mr. Price, while excavating for the foundation of a windmill, struck something hard about three feet below the surface.

Investigation disclosed an old iron pot. He hauled the pot out and found it filled with gold coins of various denominations and of various nationalities.

The money was found on the old home place of the very well known Drummond family of the eastern shore of Virginia. The family was immensely wealthy, and when war broke out the male members who were old enough went into the Confederate army. Before leaving for the war, it is supposed, the head of the family buried the gold for safe keeping.

Where Uncles Rule.

Uncles rule amongst the native tribes bordering Torres Straits, where the relationship between maternal uncle and nephew is regarded as being closer than that between father and son. There a man is bound to stop fighting when ordered to do so by his mother's brother, and the uncle is entitled to bid his sister's husband cease any hostilities in which he may be engaged. Moreover, the quelled combatant is required to make a present to the uncle, or brother-in-law—as the case may be—who stops him.

When a man marries in these parts his father provides the wherewithal to purchase the bride, but it is the maternal uncle who makes the actual payment, and who requires the credit attached thereto.

A man in those parts may not utter the names of his wife's relations, and when he speaks to his father or mother-in-law he must lower his voice, and speak humbly; the underlying idea being probably a pretence that he has carried his spouse away forcibly from her home, and must sue for peace.

Stock That Turned Out Well.

United States Senator George L. Turner of Washington lost his fortune and poverty stared him in the face. Turner was a lawyer, and one day a party of miners, well known to him, who had struck a lode up in British America, near Victoria, came into his office and asked him to make out some papers for them.

"We can't pay you cash for your services, Mr. Turner," said one of the party, after their business had been transacted, "but we will give you some stock and call it square."

At first Turner refused to take the stock, as his clients were all friends of his and he preferred to do the work for nothing, but on being pressed he took the certificates and tucked them away in his safe.

Two years later Senator Turner was a millionaire through these mining shares, and the mine that brought him the money and made the fortune of his friends is the famous Le Roi, one of the richest in the West.

The English receive the greatest number of letters—namely, 61,342 annually for every thousand inhabitants. The average in every thousand in Switzerland is 27,298, Germany 27,457, France, 21,064, Holland 15,046, Belgium 14,811, Sweden and Norway 12,947, Austria-Hungary 12,307, and Italy 5,887. The country best supplied with postoffices is Switzerland, with one for every 916 inhabitants.

Fearful Prisons of Old Paris.

It is not surprising that the prisons of old Paris were places of detention horrible beyond the powers of the most fertile imagination to conceive of. The Conciergerie was a representative type of one of these penitential cloacas, abodes of torture for thousands of humble and illustrious prisoners.

CHILD'S WHIM WAS COSTLY.

Turkish Sultan Gratified Prince, but at Great Expense.

"The Sultan presents his compliments to the engineer in charge and wishes him to open the bridge in course of erection in Constantinople in order to let a ship from the dockyard pass through at once."

When the message was delivered into the hands of the contractor responsible for the construction of the bridge he was thunderstruck, says London Answers. He had been working on the bridge day and night, and when the orders for its opening came from the Sultan it was not half finished.

He approached the Ministers of Marine and Finance and said it was impossible to obey his Majesty's command, as he would have to pull everything down, and it would take months to replace the scaffolding and pile driving machines.

"It cannot be helped," replied the Ministers. "If the Sultan says the bridge must be opened it must be done, or we shall lose our places, if not our heads."

So the bridge was opened, and the ship came out of the dockyard at a cost of over $500,000. It afterward transpired that the Sultan had found his infant son crying bitterly in the harem because he could not see the flag hoisted on his particular ship from the nursery windows.

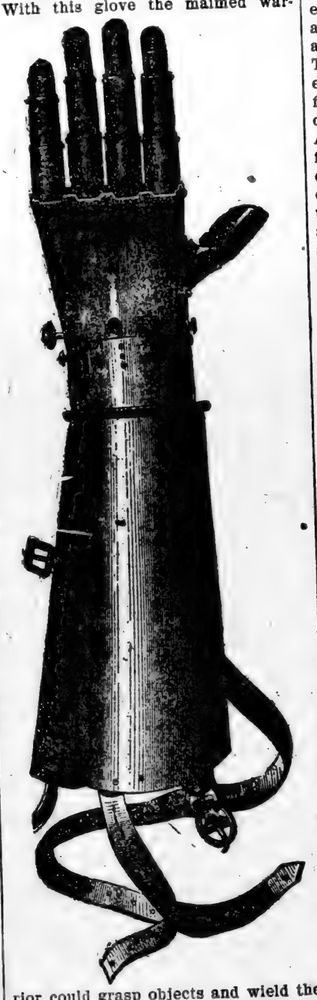
To humor the child's caprice the Sultan ordered the bridge to be opened at once and a large ironclad to be brought out of the dockyard and moored in front of Dolmabagtcheh This no doubt pleased the boy, but it caused enormous inconvenience to the people of Constantinople, to say nothing of the waste of money which had indirectly come out of their pockets.

FIGHTER HAD IRON HAND.

Replaced Natural One, Which He Had Lost in Battle.

In the old chateau near Nuremberg is preserved the iron hand of Goetz von Berlichingen, whose exploits Goethe celebrated in a drama bearing the warrior's name. This famous German knight of the late fifteenth century, having lost his hand in war, supplied its place by a glove of iron, so constructed that its members moved by an internal mechanism.

With this glove the maimed warrior could grasp objects and wield the sword or battle ax as before he received his wound.



Dived Into Gold Mine.

Two tourists camped on the ridge of a mountain lake near Como, a mining town in Colorado. While in want of something to pass the time, one suggested that the other should dive into the lake and try to discover the bottom. His friend stripped and dived in. He came up half a minute later, saying that he had found the bottom with his head.

After he put on his clothes he began to rub his head with his handkerchief.

"Look at the sand," he said, laughing, but his friend, who had been a gold miner, sprang up with a cry of surprise.

"George," he shouted, "it's gold."

And gold it was. The man who had dived into the lake had struck a placer gold mine of the richest kind. To-day the little lake near Como is the finest placer mine in the whole West, and perhaps the most remarkably discoverd one on record.

JOURNEY OF SILVER QUEEN

Great Courage and Endurance Shown by Carrier Pigeon.

A very remarkable journey, which illustrates the endurance and courage of a pigeon, was made some time ago by a bird called Silver Queen, belonging to a member of the Homing Club of South Pittsburg. On Aug. 7, 1900, this bird, with several others, was liberated from the roof of the Brown Palace hotel, Denver, in the presence of a large gathering of people interested. The pigeons, when released, made several circles in the air, then all of them flew eastward. They were first heard of four days later, when a letter dated Aug. 11 reached the Pittsburg club from Henry Homeyer, of Zieback county, South Dakota, saying that a carrier pigeon arrived at his place that afternoon just after the last of several terrific hailstorms had cleared away. Mr. Homeyer fed and watered the bird, which, afterward identified as Silver Queen, resumed its flight as though quite refreshed.

Three weeks passed and as no further news of any one of the five birds was received they were given up for lost. But on Sept. 6 Albert Greb, of Pittsburg, the owner of Silver Queen, while in his loft early in the morning was astonished by seeing his bird perch upon the windowsill. She had thus accomplished a flight of 1,700 miles within a period of thirty days, during which she passed through many most severe storms of hail, rain and wind, in a magnificently successful effort to reach her home and mate.

Wigs Are Very Ancient.

The wig is older than civilization, for the savage used one to make him more formidable on the field of battle, just as the judge does to-day to increase the terrors of the law, according to the London Chronicle.

It was the French revolution that killed the wig. What the article cost the Egyptian mummy and the Assyrian notable is not known, but before the guillotine fell in France the wig which adorned the heads of its victims cost 30 to 40 guineas. The costly decoration lingered a long time on official heads in England; so recently as 1858 Archbishop Sumner found it necessary to wear one at the marriage of the Princess Royal. Nowadays clerymen of all ranks are free of the incumbrance, which is the dignified burden of the Speaker of the House of Commons and the gentlemen of the law. Even the most glorious and subservient of footmen need but powder the hair of his own upraising.

Plants That Mimic Stones.

In South Africa a plant of the genus Mesembryanthemum, growing on stony ground, so closely resembles a pebble that it has been picked up in mistake for a stone. Another species of the same plant growing on the hills around the Karru produces two leaves about as large as ducks' eggs, having a surface resembling weathered stone of a brownish gray color, tinged with green. These plants look like stones, but for a short time they put forth bright yellow flowers. Still another species of the same plant resembles the quartz pebbles among which it grows.

HAWKS CAPTURED AT SEA

Fine Specimens Taken Prisoners Far From Any Land.

A very peculiar incident occurred recently while the new Japanese steamer America Maru was en route from the port of Yokohama to San Francisco. When the steamer was 2,000 miles from land she was visited by a large hawk. The hawk was clutching in its talons a half-devoured bird. When first discovered the hawk was alighting on the foremast, as though very weary from its long seaward flight. The second mate of the Maru climbed up into the rigging and was finally fortunate enough to secure the handsome hawk.

Three times he approached the bird, only to see it leave its perch and soar away, still fiercely clutching the half-eaten prey. Each time, however, the hawk returned to its perch. Before being captured the hawk gave battle to the plucky Japanese, using its sharp beak and talons to good advantage in warding off the hands of the mate, but the latter clung to the rigging until the bird was captured.

The hawk now occupies a place in the crew's quarters on the America Maru. On account of its brilliant plumage and general dignified bearing the bird is highly valued.

On the same voyage a smaller hawk of different breed took refuge in the rigging during a heavy gale as the steamer was crossing the China sea. That was fully 500 miles off shore. This hawk was also captured and became a pet among the Japanese sailors.

What these birds were doing so far from land and how they managed to sustain so long flights are mysteries of the deep.

Regarding wild game animals, a great many queer things might be related. One particular instance the writer recalls:

An old hunter and trapper once said he shot a buck, probably three years old, away up in the wild Bitter Root mountains. As he was very fond of boiled heart, he cooked that organ. Judge of his surprise on cutting the heart open preparatory to eating it to find a good-sized buckshot lodged down near the point. He had shot and killed the deer with a 32-caliber rifle and had shot only once.

Grewsome Punishment.

A grewsome form of punishment is still practiced in Afghanistan. A recent English expedition discovered at the top of the Latabund Pass an iron cage suspended from a pole containing a shriveled human body. The mummy was that of a thief who had been imprisoned and allowed to die of thirst and hunger in this iron cage.

Chinese Talent for Inaccuracy.

The Chinese rejoice in a wonderful talent for inaccuracy in every detail. Thus, a pound or a pina varies as it suits the merchant's fancy. In some parts you get half or a quarter as much as you do in others for the same price and measure.

Then, again, their way of calculating distance does not at all tally with Euclid. For instance, you are told that from A to B is four miles, but from B to A is eight miles. If you ask how this is possible, you are told it depends from which end you start. If you start from A it is down hill, so much easier to walk; whereas, starting from B you have to walk up hill, which is much more fatiguing—in fact it is the same as walking a longer distance on even ground.

In no land except one of topsy-turvydom like China would such a system be adopted.

How Railroad Tracks "Creep."

The rails on a track that appears to be well laid often begin to move lengthwise, so slowly that their motion is imperceptible until its results have accumulated, but with such great force that nothing will stop it. The onward movement of the rail tears up spikes and shears off steel bolts. A recent exhaustive study by an American engineer throws little light on the subject. The motion is always in the direction of traffic and is due to the moving trains, but it appears to be greatest in loosely and improperly laid track, especially that formed of short bits of rail.

FINE COLLECTION OF PLATE.

Dining Room of Maine Woman Is a Thing of Beauty.

Few collectors have a more carefully prepared dining room of plate than Mrs. H. L. Mower of Green, Me.

On the wall is the English chase, a very pretty pattern of the few dishes illustrating English sport, and nearby hangs a large platter of chrysanthemums. There is one of the R. H. Hall plates of long ago.

A large old platter is very beautiful because of its rare pattern. The scene upon it is marine. Boats have just arrived with a load of fish and lobsters. A dog sits on his haunches looking at the lobsters. In the foreground is the fisherman's cabin, with his children playing around the door. In the distance can be seen the spire of the village church. The border is of flowers.

A lakes of Killarney plate is the only one of that design east of Boston, so it is said. There is the old castle and cattle and the shepherd boy. The whole is set off and blended wonderfully with a series of waterfalls.

The old English plate of Fulham church is surely historically correct, for an Englishman who recently called to see the collection recognized it at once.

A Minnesota Fish Story.

John Munter and John Frankson returned recently from a week's outing at Swan lake. Mr. Munter tells this fish story:

"Monday night we were crossing the lake in a small boat, when I saw something floating on the surface of the water. Frankson said it was a fish, and I stuck to it that it was a piece of wood that had been driven by the wind into the middle of the lake.

"Frankson insisted that it was a fish, and was so sure of it that he fired a shot at it from a shotgun. Imagine my surprise when I saw a monster pickerel flopping about in the water. We secured the fish and it weighed close up to twenty pounds.

"I have been on Minnesota lakes a great deal, at all times of the day and night, but this is the first instance of this kind I ever heard of."—Minneapolis Special.

Slavers Caused a Famine.

One of the worst famines ever known in lower Egypt was caused by a couple of John Bull's gunboats. The vessels went up into the marshes beyond Khartum, to capture slave traders.

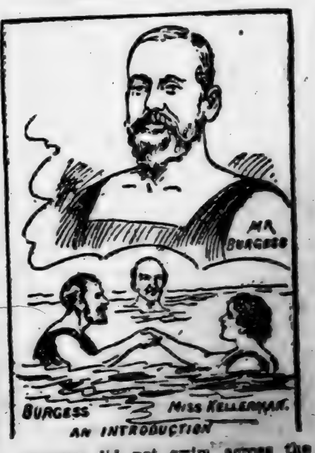
The slavers, who had made up their minds not to be caught easily, made a bold bid for freedom by cutting channels through the mass of vegetation which lined the main stream of the Nile.

The majority of them escaped in this way, but the channels they cut in their anxiety to get away brought ruin and famine to lower Egypt. The current carried the masses of lose vegetation down the river, and so completely blocked it that the Nile flood failed.

Women Run Good Newspaper.

Cambridge, Mass., is noted for many things, but of late its principal attraction is a newspaper run exclusively by women. The paper has women editors, a woman business manager, women compositors and "newsgirls" selling it upon the street. It is called the Cambridge Press and is an 8-page weekly. At first Cambridge people looked upon it as a joke, but soon the sentiment turned. Women as news gatherers did not prove as dismal a failure as many predicted, and with each issue the Press entertained and sparkled more and more.

The Channel Swim.



Burgess did not swim across the channel. In the water Burgess was introduced to a lady swimmer of note—Miss Annette Kellerman, a 19-year-old Australian girl, who may attempt to swim the channel. Heaton failed also, but will try again.—London Telegraph.

COURT HOUSE AND JAIL CONTRACT.

List of bidders and amounts of bids received by the commissioners' court Oct. 5, 1905:

Poole & Tammaner, court house alone	$7,815 00
Lee Beyers	8,380 00
Capital Constructing Co.	7,862 00
T. B. Teel	7,815 90
Alex G. Dake	6,980 00
S. S. Leonard	9,000 00
Waggoner & Dobson	6,917 00

The bid or proposition of Waggoner & Dobson, being the lowest, was accepted by the Court, but there was a slight change made in the work to be done on the jail, whereby the county gets better results than by raising it as first proposed. The jail floor is to be raised and the ceiling and roof raised five feet, and have a sufficient number of windows placed above the ceiling, also a general remodeling and overhauling of the inside and building it five feet higher on outside.

The sanitary and drainage is to be made perfect, and first-class ventilation secured, which it is thought by some could not be done under the former plan.

The contract in full was signed by the commissioners and the contractors Oct. 10. There having been some talk among the unsuccessful bidders about their not having understood what was to be done to the jail, the successful one offered to turn the contract over to any one the court would designate, saying, he had made the price so low that there was nothing in it. The commissioners sent for Mr. T. B. Teel and asked him to take the job, but he refused, telling the court that it had a good contract and at a lower price than he could do the work.

THE COTTON ASSOCIATION.

The Chilton Co. branch of the S. C. A. met in the court house at Clanton Saturday, October 7. The meeting was called to order by Pres. W. H. Conway, who, after a few remarks, introduced the Rev. N. B. Williams, of Montgomery, the organizer of that county. Mr. Williams reviewed the work done by the association and showed the immense benefit of the organization to the farmer in the past year, and appealed to all present to stand by the association in the future, to pay their dues, and to HAVE CONFIDENCE in each other. On reassembling after dinner strong talks were made by Judge Reynolds, Rev. J. H. Thomas and others. Judge Reynolds said: "If the association is a failure, the farmer is the cause of it." Pres. Conway offered cards to be posted at all public gins in the county asking for the 3 cents per bale contribution from all cotton raisers in the county. The following resolutions were passed: Resolved, That we endorse the action of the S. C. A. at Ashville, N. C., in fixing the minimum price of cotton at 11 cents, and urge our members, when practicable, to hold their cotton for this figure and that under NO CIRCUMSTANCES will we accept less than 10 cents, and insist on all farmers cooperating with us in this movement. Resolved: That we pay our brother from Montgomery Co, (Rev. N. B. Williams) $5.00 and his expenses, and heartily thank him for efforts in our behalf today, and earnestly commend him to other counties.

A motion was put and carried that the three first officers (Pres., V. Pres. and Sec.), appoint organizers for each Beat, and thoroughly work up the whole county. The committee named the following gentlemen, viz.: Beat 1, J. W. Sorrell; Beat 2, R. G. Cofer; Beat 3, J. H. Thomas; Beat 5, J. A. Mitchell; Beat 6, I. M. Deason; Beat 8, T. U. Crumpton; Beat 9, J. D. Collins; Beat 10, S. S. Scott and E. L. Mannity; Beat 11, J. W. Cox. Dues at 3 cents per bale, amounting to $7.30, were paid to the secretary during the meeting.

J. N. DENNIS,
Secretary.

SOUTHERN COTTON ASSOCIATION

Chilton Co. Sub-Division.

To Farmers, Landlords and Tenants:

At the meeting of the executive committee of the S. C. A. at Asheville, N. C., the assessment on every bale of cotton grown by members was placed at 3 cents.

At a meeting of the Chilton Co. association the county ex. committee was empowered to enforce this assessment.

The amount is small, and it is hoped that those even not members will co-operate in raising it.

The association has already added millions to the wealth of our country and the price of cotton would likely now rule at 8 cents but for it. The public ginneries are authorized to collect this 3 cents per bale.

W. H. CONWAY, President.

SCHOOL TAX ELECTION.

The county commissioners and the county board of education had a joint conference Tuesday and mutually agreed to fix Feb. 6, 1906, as the date to hold the election for the special school tax for this county.

RANDOLPH.

We welcome the new Pleasant Grove and Calera correspondents in the last Union.

Henry Busby, section foreman here, has secured a position with the L. and N. Railroad and will move his family to Jemison.

S. P. Franklin, of Pleasant Grove, was a welcome caller last week.

"Squire" J. A. Caddell, of beat 3, was in town Friday. He is one of the leading young reformers of Chilton. He originally came from Bibb. He is a man of deep thought and fine ability. Such men as Mr. Caddell should be appreciated. They are the material with which the people's cause must build for the future.

Joseph T. Waldrup was in town Monday. He will soon move to Maplesville.

J. M. Price and family, of Pleasant Grove, visited relatives here Saturday.

Everybody seems cheerful. The high prices for which Republicanism is proverbial makes people feel good. Cotton is a good price. Potatoes are abundant. Fair Luna floods the landscape with her mellow light, and while we are thus conditioned we think of the days of yore, while under the administration of Hayes the people were contented and happy. Also under the Garfield and Arthur administrations people were happy, so it does seem that true Republicanism is the party for the progressive American people. We heard a minister well known in Chilton say he could think of no time in which he had rather live than the present. We find reasons abundant for such an expression. Why, we are living as some one has said, "In a grand and awful time, in the time described by the prophet in holy writ as the evening time, yes, the beautiful 'evening light'" of the present dispensation is shining brightly and those who are in this increasing light are indeed a happy people.

Let us all speak a good word for the Union. May it grow better and better as the advocate of the people. Now for a strong pull all along the line.

"ONE OF THE BOYS."

MARS HILL.

Our S. S. is progressing nicely. Our lodge of F. E. and C. U. of A. met Saturday and we're glad to see our brother farmers so deeply interested in this organization and hope all will come in. We'd be glad to have our County Lecturer give us a call at any time. Let him notify us. J. N. Scott has been using his new mowing machine and hay rake and has saved a fine lot of hay for A. J. Scott. I think they've got the right idea on the feed question. J. M. Foshee, E. G. Cofer and J. N. Scott attended the S. C. A. meeting in Clanton Saturday and report a good time. J. F. Clark has bought a piece of land lying just north of the church. Swapping horses has been all the go here for some days, some gypsies being camped near Jemison. Everybody is busy gathering corn, cotton or peas. O. P. Scott is getting tired of living out "in the sticks" I guess, as he is trying to buy a place nearer to Jemison. Buck Smith is very ill with paralysis of left side. J. N. Scott has a fine yoke of six-year-old oxen, good wagon and a 7-year-old mare for sale. I'm still watching the travel up the big hill so as to tell the judge in time.

DAD'S PLOW BOY.

PLEASANT HILL, NO. 2.

October 9, 1905.

Brothers and Sisters:

I feel thankful today to meet such an intelligent audience as I have here. Though small in number, I feel we have a claim to the promise of our Savior, who said "when as many as two or three are gathered together." We feel thankful to our Great Preserver that we have lived to see this day in which we have the honor of joining this great and noble order. This is not child's play. Let us be up and doing "while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work." Brethren and sisters, we should ever stick to the principles of Truth and Justice and "when the roll is called" be ready to respond. It is true, sisters, that you haven't much to say, but your appearance gives us pleasure. Brothers, the close observance of little things is the secret of success in business. It is for the good of our beloved order that we implicitly study to lay aside selfishness, to avoid any act that would deter or discourage a fellow member as long as life lasts. Be brotherly, be loving and be true to your obligation that you have taken in the Farmers' Educational and Co-operative Union of America. Now, brothers and sisters, you are too good a people to be lost. Take THE UNION, read and ponder and be converted. "While the lamp holds out to burn the vilest sinner may return." Let's join hands all around and do all we can for co-operation and may God ever be with us. Success to THE UNION and its many readers, and special thanks to the editor. Yours as ever,

D. P. MARTIN,
Secretary.

CALERA NOTES.

Your correspondent has a sore finger, consequently can't write much this time. Mrs. F. Stein, widow of the late S. Stein, who is temporarily residing in Birmingham, educating her children, Leo and Etta, visited home folks here Saturday, returning Monday. Members of U. C. V. Camp 1481 are reminded again that Saturday, October 14, is the regular meeting, and 10 a. m. is the hour. Be prompt, brethren. Charles Johnson, tenant on Judge L. H. Reynolds' plantation, has gathered 10 bales of cotton this year—sold 6 bales, ranging in price from 11 cents down. Rev. E. A. Finley, of Texas, a Christian (Campbellite) minister, is holding a series of meetings near the Moss place, 2 miles from Calera, and is said to be doing a good work. Several conversions and one baptism up to last Saturday. The Holcomb and Bowden building is completed, and the Wade building is moving along rapidly. Telephone nearly ready to talk. Circuit court grinding away slowly. No serious sickness in town and weather cool and cloudy.

VETERAN.

JEMISON.

All full of glee and prosperity here. Our high school opened on the 3d inst. with bright prospects. Prof. Harwell, principal; Miss Williams, assistant. We now have a free telephone line from here to Hubbard and soon to be extended to Randolph. Then the line will embrace Centreville, Blocton, Six Mile and other towns in Bibb. Let the good work go on. Mrs. D. C. Hubbard has returned from a visit to Plantersville. Mrs. Lillie Honeycutt, who has been spending the summer with her parents here, has returned to her home at Centreville. We hear that Mr. and Mrs. Anderson will remove from here to Birmingham soon. B. M. Gentry, former tax collector, is here looking after his business. Property is rapidly advancing in Jemison. Let everybody attend the State Fair in Birmingham, especially on the 23d, and see the greatest man that has ever filled the presidential chair, to-wit, Roosevelt. Success to THE UNION and the Republican Party.

A TRUE REPUBLICAN.

COLLINS-COOLEY.

Married on October 8th, at the residence of the bride's father, in Clanton, Hon. Sam W. Collins and Miss Rosa Cooley, Probate Judge L. H. Reynolds performing the ceremony. The groom is our popular circuit clerk and a son of that grand old citizen, T. J. Collins, of Collins' Chapel. The bride is the third daughter of our esteemed fellow citizen, former Sheriff J. T. Cooley, a very attractive young lady very popular with her intimates. Both have many friends who all join in wishing the happy pair all kinds of good luck and prosperity. Mr. and Mrs. Sam W. Collins will reside in Thorsby, he being general manager of the Farmers' Warehouse and Fertilizer Company at that city. Mr. Collins has a handsome house there which he has been quietly furnishing for some time. THE UNION extends its sincere and hearty congratulations to the newly wedded pair, and hopes that their only troubles will be little ones.

NEW HOPE.

Editor Union:

This part of Shelby county is busy picking cotton. Everybody in the valley is trying to get through gathering before Jack Frost nips their fingers. The Union Lodge had a big picnic Saturday with Judge Longshore and others for speakers. Everybody had a good time. Frank Sorrel spent Sunday with J. M. Maddox's family. Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Collins visited P. F. Sorrell Sunday. Bill Bush is the proudest man in our valley, his wife having presented him with a fine baby girl Sunday. Mrs. Will Grimsby and daughter Muriel have returned from Hadley, where they have been visiting her brother, Lewis Sorrell. Success to THE UNION and its readers.

BEAT NINE ITEMS.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather the farmers are getting bad behind with their cotton picking.

Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Gentry made a business trip to Selma Saturday.

Prof. Abbott, organizer for the Farmers' Educational Union, delivered a very instructive address at the Cross-Road School House Wednesday night. After the address he called for members and several came forth and enrolled.

Mr. J. L. Baker and daughter, Miss Mary, visited relatives and friends here last week.

Mr. J. W. Hays and wife are visiting at Blocton.

NIM ROD.

THORSBY LETTER.

Mr. T. T. Thorson arrived with four gentlemen from Pennsylvania on last Wednesday's excursion. The gentlemen returned to the north on Sunday and Mr. Thorson left for the north the following day. Miss Tarina Paulson entertained a number of her lady friends in honor of her birthday on last Thursday. Rev. Eggan and his wife arrived here from Minnesota on Thursday last. They will spend the winter in Thorsby. Rev. Hellend left for a visit to Tennessee last week. Miss Ericson and Miss Howard spent Friday afternoon in Clanton. Miss Esther Berlin entertained the young girls of Thorsby at her home on last Saturday, it being her fifth birthday. Mr. George Freeman has been compelled to go to his home on account of sickness. His brother is filling his position at Stanley's. Mr. Berlin is moving into his beautiful new residence. The Carlson residence is nearing completion. Mr Elaine Burnett and Mr. Jim Honeycutt spent several days in Birmingham last week. Mr. W. C. Edler, the editor of the UNION, was a visitor in town last Friday. Mrs. I. E. Sarber returned to Thorsby last week after spending two pleasant months in the north visiting friends and relatives. Mr. Robinson, who is working in Tennessee, spent several days with his family in Thorsby last week. Mr. Thornton, who has been in Thorsby for some time, has returned home. Mr. G. H. Gerald spent Sunday and Monday in the capital city. Rev. Clark spoke at the Union Protestant church both Sunday, morning and evening. Mr. S. E. Norton, who has been in the north for several months, has returned home. Mr. Heaton and his son spent Sunday with home folks. Mrs. Kile is visiting friends and relatives in Birmingham. Miss Gallagher and Miss Fay spent Saturday and Sunday with home folks in Montgomery. Mr. Edward O'Grady spent Sunday and Monday in Thorsby. Miss Kirkaby, who has been visiting in the north for the past two months, has returned to Thorsby. The Sunshine Society met with Miss Clemantine Hawthorne on Tuesday. Owing to the miserable weather the attendance was rather small. The meetings of the society will hereafter be held on Tuesdays in place of Wednesdays. We are glad to welcome Mr. S. A. Collins and his bride to Thorsby. May happiness accompany them all through life. Owing to the bad weather the young folks did not surprise the newly married couple as they had intended to. They have not, however, given up their idea of doing so.

LOCAL AND PERSONAL.

All good people like to hear of a friend's success, so our readers will be pleased to hear that James M. Moore, THE PAINTER, who formerly lived here, but is now in Selma, is doing a fine business at his new home. His pay roll for help is about $150 per week, and jobs are just crowding in on him. Well, Bro. and Sister Moore deserve prosperity and we are glad its coming to them.

Rev. B. H. Vickers and family passed through Clanton Thursday on their way to attend the Weogufka Association at Poplar Springs.

HALF DEER, HALF COW.

Freak Animal Seen in Minnesota Said by Some to Have Horns.

A deer with a cow's tail is northern Minnesota's latest sensation. The animal is not so terrible to look at as was Cass Lake's great hoag, but it is more real. That it has a cow's tail there is no doubt, for forty-five men in an extra gang working on the new extension of the Duluth, Missabe and Northern road saw the mysterious appendage, and more than once.

Some of the more suspicious of the crew stoutly maintain that the deer is a close relation of the devil, and that it also has cow's horns and cloven hoofs. This latter charge cannot be well denied, for the cloven hoof habit is one that all members of the venison tribe are guilty of. There is some doubt about the cow's horns, however.

If the deer is a doe it wouldn't have any horns at all, and if it were a buck it wouldn't have cow's horns, for a cinch. This line of argument was offered to bring the men in question to a reasonable frame of mind, but they gently reminded us that the male members of the cow family sport horns not unlike those of their gentle better halves. Be that as it may, the unholy deer is there, the horns or no horns, it has a cow's tail, or to follow the reasoning of the superstitious ones above quoted, the tail may be the vertebral extension of a buck. The concensus of opinion among those who saw the strange animal, is that it has no horns, and, in this event cow's tail will probably come as near hitting it as anything else.

Several range people within the last few days have had something to say of the freak. They say it has been seen so many times, and by so many men, that there is no doubting the tail part of the story. The animal seems to have inherited certain domestic proclivities along with its badge of civilization, for it has a strong hankering for the society of human beings, or else for the eatables furnished by human beings. Any way, it is never very far from the camp of the Missabe construction gang, and is seen almost daily, both morning and evening. The tail is easily observed, for whenever its owner is frightened the appendage is thrown straight up into the air, standing up four feet or more, like a flagpole, while the deer bounds away. The men are careful to see that no one shoots the animal, for they take a certain pride in it. Attempts are being made to photograph it, and it is even hoped that it may be captured alive.—Minneapolis Tribune.

Measuring Eye Jumps.

We know that an eye, at ordinary reading distance, takes in about one inch of a line at a time, and that in reading a line of an ordinary book the eye makes five or six distinct jumps. But as the movements are so very minute and rapid, how have they been studied?

A beam of light is thrown upon the cornea of the eye, and this beam is reflected by the cornea on a photographic plate. As the eye moves in reading the reflected beam also moves and upon developing the plate, which is also kept moving, a zigzag line is found. A study of such photographic tracings shows that the eyes in turning back to pick up the next line have some difficulty in so doing. The longer the line of print the greater the effort, and for this reason we may conclude that a narrow line is better for an eye than a long one, and if the line be much wider than the ordinary newspaper column there is greater effort involved.—Jeweler's Weekly.

London's Painful Problem.

The announcement of Mr. Wilson, junior surgeon on the Discovery during the Antarctic expedition, that ice destroys the desire for alcohol has set London's drinkers a painful problem. They are on the horns of a dilemma. In this weather they would much prefer to ice their clay moistening, but they do not want to run any risks.—London Globe.

Woman Seeks Pardon.

A woman and six children have come to the capital to try to have a husband and father released from the toils of the laws of Alabama, which is demanding and collecting from him twenty years of penal servitude for murder in the second degree. Oscar Earle is the man, convicted in Tallapoosa in 1902, and now at hard labor. So far as can be ascertained his chances for release are poor, though not altogether helpless.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is hit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

Little Things

Only a little shriveled seed—
It might be a flower or grass or weed;
Only a bed of earth on the edge
Of a narrow, dusty window-ledge;
Only a few scant summer showers;
Only a few clear, shining hours;
That was all. Yet God could make
Out of these, for a sick child's sake,
A Blossom-wonder as fair and sweet
As ever broke at an angel's feet.

Only a life of barren pain,
Wet with sorrowful tears for rain;
Warmed sometimes by a wandering gleam
Of joy that seemed but a happy dream.
A life as common and brown and bare
As the box of earth in the window there;
Of a perfect soul in a narrow room—
Pure as the snowy leaves that fold
Over the flower's heart of gold.

MISS PETERS' POPULARITY

BY DELIA CAMPBELL MACLEOD

(Copyright, 1905, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

Little Miss Peters toiled up the three flights of steps to her tiny hall bedroom. She threw her bag on the bed and walked deliberately to the mirror, only stopping to throw open the blind for more light. She sat down deliberately before the hideous little glass and began to take another inventory of her good looks.

Not even one who loved her—she smiled bitterly at that thought—could call her pretty. She was homely. Not with that piquant sort of plainness that is almost as attractive as beauty, but with a sort of ugliness. The forehead bulged, the eyes were dull and sunken, the cheeks presented no contours to speak of, and the whole expression was owlishly pathetic.

She examined each feature as callously as if it were a statue she were appraising. The face was the same. As hateful to her as ever. She closed her eyes wearily. She was plain, unattractive—ugly. And if one ever wants good looks it is when she is twenty. Miss Peters was barely that, but she looked almost any age, up to forty.

She slipped the pins out of the tight little knot at the back of her neck and shook her hair down over her shoulders. It was not pretty hair. It was thin and scraggly and mouse colored. In the hand mirror she raised to get a glimpse of her profile she could see her bent little shoulders reflected. A bookkeeper who bends over her work from eight in the morning until six at night rarely has pretty shoulders.

And seventy-five dollars is not much to pay a girl who does the work of two men. Miss Peters sent fifty dollars of this amount home every month. After her board was paid, little was left to waste on feminine finery.

"I wouldn't care," (she had fallen into the habit of talking to herself), "I wouldn't care if I were ugly and poor if any of them liked me." She buried her face in the pillows and began to cry. "I never have any fun." She lay staring at the ceiling, thinking hard. And her thoughts were even more pathetic than her face. One by one she took the girls in the boarding house, and studied their faces from memory—and their friends. There was only one of them who had ever manifested the slightest friendliness for her and that was Miss Mathis. She did not wonder that people loved Miss Mathis and thought her beautiful—she was. She reminded Miss Peters always of a queen who had strayed somehow into a cheap boarding-house incognito, that she might learn to know and love the least of her subjects. Miss Mathis, with her gorgeous hair and eyes was so beautiful and magnetic no one could keep from loving her. But it was the others she wondered about—the dozens of stenographers, book keepers and school teachers. Very few of them were really pretty, yet they had friends. The landlady's daughter was no beauty, but all the men liked her.

"I know," exclaimed Miss Peters, with sudden energy, "it's only the gay girls that are popular. I will make 'em like me, too!" Her face had emerged from the pillow. A new light was in her eyes, the light of one who determined to conquer. "A girl who goes along, tending to her own business and living up to her ideas of what a lady should be. What's coming to her?" Unconsciously she fell into the slang of the other girls.

She rose with fresh determination and began to dress for dinner. She pulled out her best frock, the one kept religiously for Sundays, and her good slippers. She would dress up like the other girls. She would even "make up" like Daisy, the landlady's daughter. To do this she had to improvise cosmetics. A rose petal from her best hat put color into her cheeks and lips. She darkened her brows and lashes. She almost fancied that she saw in the face reflected a likeness to Mrs. Lively, the wife of a drummer further down the hall. Then she began to comb her hair. Not in the usual knot, but in an elaborate and much tangled pompadour.

By the time she had her dress buttoned, the dinner bell rang and, without taking time to consider her daring, she ran lightly down to the dining room. She did not see, fortunately, the elevated brows behind her back, or hear any of the whispered comments on her appearance. It was a pity she did not know that one man, Mr. Hughes, the kindly-faced new boarder, was disappointed in her. Before this he had felt a certain shy friendliness for the modest little bookkeeper, who reminded him somehow of a fragrant clover blossom in a bunch of artificial flowers. And so, he was thinking, as he watched her flippant and painted, that she was like the others, after all. He felt a mild sort of pity that he could not have explained to himself, but all the time he knew that the others were making fun of Miss Peters behind her back.

But the little bookkeeper, with an almost fierce gaiety, was chattering away to a commercial student who sat next to her. After dinner she followed the others in the parlor, still determined to be one of them. Her companion at dinner was at her heels, encouraging her. Later she went to sit on the steps to the side gallery with him while he smoked a cigarette.

"Have one?" he invited, companionably. "Daisy smoked one with me last night." For an instant Miss Peters' face went white under the paint—with anger. Then she remembered she must be like the others if she wanted to be popular. No one could be popular and be a prig.

She reached out for the cigarette, and the young man offered her a light from the one he was smoking—and moved up nearer. Two whiffs of the cigarette turned her deathly faint.

"I think I'll go up to my room," she faltered, throwing it aside with a little forced laugh.

"Don't go," he begged. "Ain't you game enough to finish it? Must be your first one."

"It is," she admitted, fighting back her disgust for her companion. "Good night."

"Aren't you going to kiss me good night?" he whispered, rising. "Daisy always—"

"How dare——" But Miss Peters did not finish. She stumbled blindly through the dining room and on up the three flights of stairs to her own room. She slammed the door and dropped on her knees beside the tiny white bed.

"O God," she sobbed, "what have I done? Why did you let me do it? What did it matter if I were ugly! That I had no friends. Nothing matters any more! I have lost everything now. My self re-spect is go-one for-ev-er—"

And she was on her knees, still sobbing and praying in the dark when the last boarder came in for the night and passed whistling to his room at 1 o'clock.

Some men's idea of the pursuit of happiness is to sprinkle salt on its tail.

CALLED ELIXIR OF LIFE.

Men of Eminence Testify to the Worth of Buttermilk.

Assuming that you have forsworn alcohol, and have found nothing to replace the glass of beer, try buttermilk. In good condition, at its sourest, it is a genuinely refreshing, sharp drink—acid, but not thin like lemonade—nourishing, but not insipid like milk. It is a harmless substitute for intoxicants, a remedy for tuberculosis, and all pulmonary complaints, and beneficial to the digestion.

Russian Koumiss, nearly the same thing, is sour mare's milk, and it is well known that the tribes who drink it are immune from consumption. Koumiss has consequently been largely used as a cure for that disease. The famous Russian Count Tolstoy, who was at one time afflicted with tuberculosis, attributes his cure largely to the drinking of Koumiss in abundance, while living in a tent on the Russian steppes.

A famous English physician, Sir Lauder Brunton, says of buttermilk, that it "quenches the thirst, supplies food, and also contains a ferment which, if absorbed, may be useful in aiding the conversion of sugar into lactic acid within the body. I am inclined to attribute the benefits occasionally derived from the use of skimmed milk to its possessing similar properties to buttermilk. But I consider the latter superior. When it is allowed to become very sour, and all its milk sugar has been converted into lactic acid, it would probably be still better."

According to Professor Metchnikoff, sour milk or buttermilk is a sort of elixir of life, in that it is a remedy for "the slow intoxications that weaken the resistance of the higher elements af the body."

Buttermilk is very easy of digestion and assimilation. In diabetes, where milk is more or less objectionable, buttermilk can be safely given with advantage. It is also given as a refrigerant.

For Outdoor Living.

Open-air meals for the family are most desirable. The fresh air sharpens the appetite, and anything tastes better out of doors. A wire-screened porch makes a most desirable summer dining room. A similarly protected enclosure likewise makes a most desirable "camping-out" place for sleeping in hot nights. Indeed, one is most fortunate who can command such an insect-proof, fresh-air sleeping apartment for the entire season.

There are many who have neither porch nor shade trees to protect from the rays of the sun, but there are many substitutes. One woman stitched together breadths of unbleached muslin, sewed rings to the four corners, and attached these to her clothes line posts, thus making a canopy under which the household enjoyed out-of-doors living. Another family of whom we have read, had constructed a light, houselike frame, roofed with canvas, inclosed with netting, and mounted on rollers so that it might follow the sun or shade, as desired. If one has the purpose to get the benefit of outdoor living, there are many ways to accomplish it, with wonderfully good results.

Not What Bishop Expected.

The late Bishop Spaulding, of Colorado, was a pioneer who traveled great distances and visited remote camps and outlying hamlets. One of the stories he used to tell was as follows:

"I was addressing a Sunday school in a mountain town where an Episcopal service had never been held before. I was wearing my gown, in which I had conducted the service not long before. I had given the children a practical talk and after it was over I told them that they might ask any question about anything they did not understand.

"A bright looking little fellow raised his hand immediately.

"'Well, my boy?' said I.

"'Please, sir,' said he, pointing an eager finger at my gown, 'is that all you have got on or do you wear pants under it?'"

A Tantalizing Maiden.

Do I love her?
Dimpling red lips at me pouting,
Dimpling shoulders at me flouting;
No, I don't!

Do I love her?
Prisoned in those crystal eyes
Purity forever lies;
Yes, I do!

Do I love her?
Little wild and willful fiction,
Teasing, torturing contradiction;
No, I don't!

Do I love her?
With kind acts and sweet words she Aids and comforts poverty;
Yes, I do!

Do I love her?
Quick she puts her cuirass on,
Stabs with laughter, stings with scorn;
No, I don't!

Do I love her?
No! Then to my arms she flies,
Filling me with glad surprise;
Ah, yes I do!

Where He Got Them.

Jones sat working at his desk when a Hebrew flower peddler stuck his head in at the door and asked if he was going to the big Yale-Harvard football game on the morrow at New Haven, if so, he would guarantee for $1 a bunch of twice as many violets as any one else.

The offer was taken, the violets delivered and worn to the game by a young lady who not only used them that day but the following Sunday.

A few days later the Hebrew again called, and Jones said those violets gave excellent satisfaction, but if you have no objections I would like to know how you were able to sell so many violets for so little money on a day when they command a high price.

His reply was, "I get 'em off corpses."

AMBITION AS A TONIC.

It Is Well, Occasionally, to Depart from the Beaten Track.

The world is full of "beaten-track" people who exist exactly after the fashion of millions of men and women who have preceded them. New ideas, new methods, new undertakings are alien to them, and to move them out of the beaten track would require little less than a moral or material cyclone. Their gait is plodding, and their motto, "Let well enough alone." These people have their uses, no doubt in the general scheme of things mundane. They are important factors in making life a severe discipline. They hold in check the enthusiastic, progressive and original people who would otherwise run this poor old world too swiftly.

Granted their usefulness, it might be possible, and would surely be advantageous, for a smaller number of beaten-track people to serve the purposes for which they exist; and some power evoked to transform the majority of them into progressive and enthusiastic citizens of the world. Their numbers have far outgrown the needs, while the ranks of the advance guard of humanity have grown thin.

Our attitude toward the sluggish and satisfied people ought to be one of pity rather than scorn, perhaps, for they are generally the product of untoward circumstances. Physical or mental or moral incapacity is responsible for their apathy, and has left them only energy or will sufficient for the beaten track. They at least are far above the degenerate and criminal classes in humanity's scale, for these are too feeble in intellect and will to keep even in the beaten track, not to mention the power to blaze a higher and finer way through the world.

Johnny's Welcome.

"My boy! my boy! Oh, has anybody seen my little Johnny!" cried a poor mother, distractedly looking in every direction and inquiring of every person whom she met if anything had been seen of her eight-year old boy on the long strip of sand which lies between Seaside Park and the ocean at Coney Island, where at a very modest estimate fully 15,000 persons had congregated.

Just at this moment a kindly-looking man in a bathing suit hove into view, leading by the hand a small boy, convulsively sobbing, but tightly clutching a half-eaten frankfurter with a small, grimy hand, liberally sprinkled with sand.

"Oh, there you are, you little villian, you!" the woman shrieked, as she caught sight of the weeping little chap. eph Eiseman that he was so bad that to death?" and she grabbed her long lost son and gave him an unmerciful belaboring.

"How glad she is to get him again!" sarcastically remarked the finder of the boy to a bystander.—New York World.

She Knew His Temper.

At the close of the late Spanish-American war, and when the troops were returning home, a member of the Seventy-first Regiment, New York, was stricken with fever and sent to St. Catherine's hospital, in Brooklyn, and upon his wife calling at the hospital to inquire after her husband's condition she was informed by Mr. Joseph Eliseman that he was so bad that she would not be allowed to see him. She was rather insistent, when Mr. Eiseman said: "Madam, I am very sorry I cannot grant your request, his temperature is very high this morning and an interview might endanger his life."

Pausing a moment, Mrs. Gorman, the wife, said: "Indeed, Mr. Eiseman, you cannot tell me anything about his temper. I am not married to him these twelve years without knowing full well of his high temper." And with that she departed.

In the Catechism.

The late Rev. Walpole Warren was hearing the Sunday school repeat the catechism one Sunday preceding confirmation, when a boy from the class of small children ventured to ask a question of the minister.

"Mr. Warren," he inquired in an anxious tone. "Why does the multiplication table make people wicked?"

"Why do you ask that question, John? I never knew it to do so," he said.

John turned to his catechism and read from it the question:

"'Did man grow worse as he began to multiply?' And the accompanying answer, 'He did.'"—New York World.

Not Wholly Crazy.

A supervisor of an insane asylum directed one of the half-witted inmates to whitewash the walls. The lunatic did as directed and really performed a very creditable job, but for some unforeseen reason he had neglected to whitewash a space over the clock.

"That is very well done," said the supervisor as he returned to inspect, but catching himself up short he demanded:

"But why did you leave that space over the clock?"

"Oh, I don't believe in working over-time," was the response.

Johnny Knew.

A class of boys were given a lesson in geography, each having a book containing a description of the earth before him.

Suddenly the teacher called on one of the youngsters (who, evidently, had been paying little attention to what was being said) to answer the following question:

"Johnny, where is Europe?" "Page 69." was the boy's reply.

What Situation Was Worth

Propriety of Keeping Up Appearances Impressed on Officer Holding Important Corporation Position.

Some months ago an officer holding an important executive post in one of the greater corporations received a kindly, almost neighborly, call from one of his fellow directors. This officer had returned from a brief vacation trip. The fellow director said to him that in view of their long friendship and their respect and admiration each for the ability and achievements of the other, he was going to speak somewhat plainly to that officer. Then he put this question bluntly to him:

"What will you be willing to pay to keep your place?"

It seemed a strange question. The executive officer did not know at first what to make of it. He saw, of course, that there was some kindly, although hidden, purpose in the question and so he answered in the spirit in which the inquiry was put. He said that, of course, if it were necessary and was the proper thing to do, he would rather pay a large sum of money than to lose that office, for it represented his ambition and was in line with his achievements. "But I do not see what you are driving at," the officer continued.

Then the officer was told that while, of course, it was impossible to take seriously the question, "What money are you willing to take to hold the office," nevertheless there was a price which he would have to pay and that price was this: He must give up ostentatious living, he must be especially careful to observe local ordinances, not driving recklessly with his automobile, he must be careful to keep all the appearances of propriety, he must do all things that a sober-minded, self-respecting citizen should do, and if his disposition led him to genteel dissipation, riotous living or to ostentation then the giving up of those things was the price he would have to pay if he desired to keep his office. And the reason why that price was exacted was that as officer of a corporation in which the public has invested heavily he must necessarily heed public opinion even in the conduct of his private life.—New York Letter in Philadelphia Press.

The Importance of Proper Breathing

Disease Germs Find Lodgement in Unused Portions of the Lungs — Frequent Cause of Dread Tuberculosis.

Air is made to enter the chest by enlarging the chest cavity, or thorax. This is accomplished by a downward movement of the diaphragm and an outward movement in all directions of the lateral chest walls. This is largely accomplished by the muscles which lift the ribs and pull them outward from the center of the body. The lungs are emptied by the natural return of the parts to a passive state, when the muscles cease their pulling upon the chest walls. In ordinary deep respiration, when the breathing movements are not interfered with, the movement consists chiefly of an enlargement of the trunk in the region of the waist. There is at the same time a marked bulging forward of the abdominal wall. This style of breathing is sometimes, though incorrectly, termed abdominal respiration. In abdominal respiration proper there is a forward movement of the abdomen, but without marked enlarging of the waist. Abdominal respiration is most frequently seen in sedentary men and infants. The opposite style of breathing, known as costal breathing, is seen in women who habitually wear waist-constricting garments. The principal movement is at the top of the chest.

Neither costal nor abdominal respiration is capable of bringing the lungs fully into action. Only such portions of the lungs act as lie in contact with a portion of the chest wall which moves during the respiratory effort, and in those parts which lie in contact with portions of the chest wall which remain idle the air stagnates. Carbonic acid gas and other poisonous matters accumulate. The living cells are thereby poisoned and paralyzed. Pneumonia germs and other disease-producing microbes and especially the germs of tuberculosis are likely to find lodgment in these idle parts. The paralyzed cells are easily overcome by the invading germs and so an acute inflammation may be set up, or, still worse, that dreadful disease, pulmonary tuberculosis, or consumption, obtains a foothold.

Stamped Particular Date on Forehead

Novelist, Knowing His Weakness, Has Great Scheme to Keep Himself at Work—Puts Iodine to Good Use.

"One of my clients," says a lawyer, "is a well known novelist whose name, of course, I can't give you. He is a curious character—not exactly lazy, but always being diverted from his work on the slightest excuse. His trouble is that he is such a capital fellow he will take up with any suggestion made to him to go anywhere or to do anything. He loves companionship, and is restless if he stays for any length of time in the house.

"Well, one day some of his business needed his immediate attention, and I called him up on the telephone.

"'I can't come down,' he answered.

"'Sick?' I asked.

"'No, not sick,' replied he, 'but I can't go out—that's all. Better drop in here with the papers you want me to sign as you go up town.'

"I could not imagine why a man who was not ill should not be able or willing to attend to such important business. But when I met him at the door of his apartment I could see quickly enough why he had no wish to appear in public. Across his forehead, written in a brownish yellow, was a date—Jan. 30.

"I couldn't help laughing, and he looked at me in a puzzled way for a second, and then he said, 'O, I see. You are wondering what this date on my face is for.'

"'Yes,' said I. 'Who wrote it there?'

"'I did.'

"'You did!' I cried, wondering if he was insane.

"'Yes,' he replied. 'You know what a great hand I am for flying here and there and neglecting my work? Well, I have hit on a scheme to fool myself. When I have a lot of work to do I take some iodine and write the date up here. It won't wash off, and a man can hardly go about much with it on. It wears off after several days. Meanwhile, here I stay and write like fury!'"—Youth's Companion.

Humorous Description of Modern Woman Who Explores House and Makes Some Interesting Discoveries Therein.

Met such a dear child in the park. So delighted with her that I could not keep myself from rushing up and kissing her.

On asking nurse whose child it was, found—most curious thing—it was my own. Asked the woman if I had any more like it and was informed there were two others equally charming.

Really delighted to think one has such nice children. Shall certainly call in at the nursery—I suppose we have a nursery—and see the others. I might take them some toys—I believe children like toys—only I don't know what these particular ones have already. Perhaps it would be safer to take chocolates.

By the way, the disagreeable person I met in the hall a few mornings ago turns out to be my husband. I had quite forgotten about him. He was pointed out to me at the play last night.

Visited children this afternoon. Quite an adventure. Wandered about a lot at first. No idea had such a big house, and at last found myself in kitchen. Discovered most obliging person, who offered to show me where nursery was situated.

Children rather shy at first, but soon came up to me to make friends. Wanted to know where I lived and what was my name. One of them seemed to remember meeting me in the house a long time ago—must have been when children were the smart thing.

Couldn't stay long, as they don't seem used to cigarettes in the nursery, and I was due at the club for bridge. Shall certainly call again when I am less busy. Quite decent children.—London Punch

The Pathway to Life Everlasting

"For To-Day Too Soon Is Dead—So Youth with the Heart of Fire Heed Nothing That Eld Has Said."

Why does it hurt so much
To see young people in love?
His little endearing ways,
Her fond triumphant gaze,
Her furtive affectionate touch,
His care of her trumpery glove?
Why does it hurt so much
To see young people in love?

Because we were once the same,
And now we are growing old.
Because what began with a thrill,
And ought to be thrilling still,
Has sunk to the friendly and tame;
The once rich heats are cold.
Because we were once the same,
And now we are growing old.

O God, if ever we meet,
O God, I shall ask you this:
Why amid joys that live
Is passion so fugitive?
Why, when there's naught so sweet,
Is there never a second first kiss?
O God, if ever we meet,
O God, I shall ask you this:

So youth with the heart of fire,
Heed nothing that eld has said.
Think less than the buds of spring,
Be glad as the birds that sing,
For to-morrow grows ever higher,
For to-day too soon is dead.
So youth with the heart of fire,
Heed nothing that eld has said.

The earth and the fullness thereof,
Is yours, O youth, is yours!
For us the wherefore and why,
The knowledge we have to die,
For you, irresponsible love,
And life that forever endures.
The earth and the fullness thereof,
Is yours, O youth, is yours!

The Curative Power of PE-RU-NA in Kidney Disease the Talk of the Continent.

The Poorest Prime Minister

Marquis Ito is of comparatively humble birth. His father, Junsuke, was a rustic gardener. It is said that the marquis is the poorest prime minister, actual or retired, in the world. He first went to Europe by working his passage, having stowed himself away on board a ship bound for Shanghai, and concealed in a bale of silk, in which he was concealed for thirty-six hours, in order to escape the vengeance of the conservative party, which resented his advanced views and attempts to westernize Japan. He is now, perhaps, the most western in his ideas of all the Japanese, and it is his custom to spend five hours a day reading the European newspapers and magazines.

Great Admirer of Byron

An Englishman, Sir J. G. T. [illegible] is so enthusiastic an admirer of Byron that he has built in London—[illegible] street—a Byron house in the honor. There is a medallion of Byron over the door, surrounded by a wreath of laurels in statuary marble, and another inside, while several lines of his poetry are engraved on marble tablets on the walls of the entrance lobby and staircase.

The largest raindrops are about one fifth of an inch in diameter.

"I went through the catalogue of prepared foods but found them all (except Grape-Nuts) more or less indigestible, generating gas in the stomach which in turn produced headache and [illegible] other pains and aches), and therefore unavailable for my use.

Old Volcanoes in Maryland.

Prof. Philip R. Uhler returns to Baltimore with the report of a discovery which he made in the Western Maryland mountains. Three peaks, the principal one named Buzzard's Knob, crown a plateau about six miles from the city. It was for Professor Uhler to discover that the three prominences are in fact volcanoes, and that they are the very oldest type of volcanic rock that is found in the United States. These peaks are of a different form from volcanoes like Vesuvius. In the latter form of volcano molten lava and stones are forced up by the superheated steam, leaving a deep hole, but in these craters in Western Maryland the whole mountain was originally in a molten condition and the top crust was forced upward in a dome-shaped form, and such lava as did escape was forced out in vents at various places. The volcanic rock of the regions is metal-bearing and specimens of gray, green and gold copper were found by Dr. Uhler. The domes of the craters were somewhat eliptical in shape.

Portrait of Gen. Robert E. Lee.

The fact that too frequently it transpires in American history that no accurate and authentic portrait of her great men is faithfully preserved has caused a number of the devoted admirers of Gen. Robert E. Lee to interest themselves to cause a perfect picture of the great general to be made and to be preserved for all future history. This work, after a lapse of forty years, is now under way by the John A. Lowell Bank Note Company, of Boston, who are using for this purpose the exact photograph made at General Lee's residence in Richmond a few days after the surrender, which picture has always been considered by the Lee family and friends as the most perfect likeness ever taken of the general at this period. The work, when finished, will be of the highest art of steel engraving, so that it will thus be preserved for all future time.

Praise for "Freak Dinners."

Attacks having been made in the newspapers on the "freak" dinners of millionaires, the secretary of the Savay Hotel, London, replies that they are good for trade. The celebrated "gondola dinner," given by an American recently, gave employment to 100 carpenters, thirty painters and twenty decorators, all at "fancy" wages, and put money into the pockets of numerous electricians, florists, artists and other workers.

Bishop Opposes Bicycles.

Dr. Adolph Fritzen, bishop of Strasburg, has again issued an edict forbidding priests within his diocese to use bicycles. He is sharply criticised therefor by the newspapers, which call attention to the fact that bicycling ceased long ago to be a mere secular sport and that priests often find the wheel most useful, especially those who have to visit members of their congregation in remote country places.

Bacon a Business Man.

Robert Bacon's appointment as assistant secretary of state is of more than usual interest in one respect. His training has not been of the kind that has usually been looked for in the incumbent of the office which he will hold. Among his predecessors were Frederick W. All of these were men more or less skilled in either diplomacy, literature or law, whereas Mr. Bacon's training has been in business, and especially in finance.

Vegetation Defies Cold.

"People in the far north latitudes would have a bad time of it if vegetation was wholly dependent upon the heat of the sun," says a scientist. "As a matter of fact, wheat will grow in soil that, even in midsummer, is not thawed more than a foot below the surface. In Norway oats ripen under 69 degrees of north latitude, rye a half degree and barley a whole degree further north. In Mammerfest, in latitude 70 degrees, the grass grows underneath the snow. It has been found by experiment that in latitude 65 degrees north barley will grow two and a half inches and peas three inches in the twenty-four hours for several consecutive days. Barley is harvested in the week after being sown."

Advancing the Farmers' Interests.

Traveling agents and salesmen are now sent from the home offices of the Chicago packers into all South American and Asiatic countries. They are going into every land, no matter what language may be spoken or what money he used. They will exchange their goods for cowries or elephant tusks—anything to sell the product and get something in return convertible into money. It may seem odd to some folks, but traveling men, carrying cases with samples of American meat products, can be seen in the desert of Sahara, the sands of Zanzibar or in Brazil, "where the nuts come from." Great is the enterprise of the Yankee merchant. The greater the market, the greater the price and stability of the price of the product and all that goes to make it in its various stages.

George Meredith is one of the group of authors who remain faithful to the old-fashioned quill pen. OFTEN THE BEST PART OF LIFE

Help for Women Passing Through Change of Life

Providence has allotted us each at least seventy years in which to fulfill our mission in life, and it is generally our own fault if we die prematurely.

Nervous exhaustion invites disease. This statement is the positive truth.

When everything becomes a burden and you cannot walk a few blocks without excessive fatigue, and you break out into perspiration easily, and your face flushes, and you grow excited and shaky at the least provocation, and you cannot bear to be crossed in anything, you are in danger; your nerves have given out; you need building up at once! To build up woman's nervous system and during the period of change of life we know of no better medicine than Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Here is an illustration. Mrs. Mary L. Koehne, 371 Garfield Avenue, Chicago, Ill., writes:

"I have used Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for years in my family and it never disappoints; so when I felt that I was nearing the change of life I commenced treatment with it. I took in all about six bottles and it did me a great deal of good. It stopped my dizzy spells, pains in my back and the headaches with which I had suffered for months before taking the Compound. I feel that if it had not been for this great medicine for women that I should not have been alive to-day. It is splendid for women, old or young, and will surely cure all female disorders."

Mrs. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., invites all sick and ailing women to write her for advice. Her great experience is at their service, free of cost.

CHEAP INSURANCE LOANS

President McCall, of New York Life, Makes Startling Statements.

MONEY SPENT FOR LOBBYING

Investigator and Attorney Hughes of the State Insurance Inquiry Committee Makes Some Remarkable Discoveries Regarding Modern "High Finance"—How the McCalls Benefited.

New York City.—Something approaching a definite explanation of the mysterious legislative activities of "Judge" Andrew Hamilton, legislative agent of the Mutual, Equitable and New York Life companies, and of the hitherto inexplicable "yellow dog" funds came, when John A. McCall, President of the New York Life, testified that three-quarters of the measures proposed in Legislatures of the United States were "strike" or blackmailing bills, designed to "bleed" insurance companies.

Following this frank arraignment of Legislatures Mr. McCall outlined in detail the vast sums that have been handled by "Judge" Hamilton in fighting hostile legislation at various State capitals in the last five years. From the New York Life alone "Judge" Hamilton received $711,000 in this period, in addition to a single fee of $134,000 for counsel services. It will be recalled that testimony of Equitable officials revealed the fact that "Judge" Hamilton's expenses were divided between the three great companies, and if he received equal sums from the other two his expenditures for "legislative work" against insurance legislation in the last five years would aggregate over $2,000,000.

Mr. Hughes pressed home the probe into this form of insurance activity in a merciless fashion. He not only turned a flood of light upon the proceedings which permitted an official of the New York Life to swear that the company had made no campaign contributions in a year when it had actually contributed $50,000, but he gave Mr. McCall a bad half hour explaining the circumlocutions by which Governor Culberson and the Texas State officials were hoodwinked about this performance.

Most striking, however, was the admission he wrung from the witness regarding the uses to which the vast legislative funds were put. In form, Mr. McCall continued his former declaration that so far as he knew not a cent had been used corruptly to "influence legislation." In fact, he admitted that the money was turned over to "Judge" Hamilton to use in legislative halls in such a way as "to produce results." "Producing results" from the insurance point of view meant nothing more or less than the stifling of inimical legislation, whether the ordinary "strike" form of blackmail, or the recommendations of State insurance departments. Following this line Mr. Hughes led the witness to the admission that while the New York Life officially dealt only with attorneys "Judge" Hamilton was free to employ any one who could do the work, whether an attorney or not "Entire freedom" were the words with which he described "Judge" Hamilton's power.

Then Mr. Hughes took a forward step in the tracing of the methods of the great insurance lobby that has been so frequently described as existing at Albany and at other State capitals. By close cross questioning he obtained from Mr. McCall the admission that there were in many States men in a position to deal with legislative measures in such fashion as to exercise pressure to the extent of preventing the re-election of men acting counter to their wishes. Mr. McCall was not sure that those men could drive recalcitrant legislators out of politics, but he admitted their position would be "seriously strained." That the system reached to the national Congress Mr. McCall admitted in testifying to the employment of an agent to fight a Federal bill solely "because he was a man of very large acquaintance in Washington."

Apart from the legislative phases of his testimony, the most amazing single feature of Mr. McCall's examination was his admission regarding the hitherto unexplained loan of $50,000 to John R. Hegeman, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, at a nominal rate of interest. Mr. McCall, apparently nettled by Mr. Hughes' questions regarding the reason for the loan of this sum at a nominal rate of interest, declared that he regarded the interest rate as all right, and said with some feeling that he had obtained a similar loan from Mr. Hegeman at a similar rate. This apparent "break" was seized on by Mr. Hughes at once, and the fact shown that Mr. McCall, a director in the Metropolitan, had obtained a personal loan from this company of $75,000, $50,000 of it nearly three years ago, and that the rate had not been raised until after the insurance agitation had become pronounced. When Mr. Hughes attempted to emphasize an impropriety in this proceeding Mr. McCall declared with evident sincerity that he would have taken the money at a lower rate of interest if he could have obtained it.

The yearly salary roll of the McCall family drawn from the New York Life was shown to be $137,500.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR OCTOBER 15.

Subject: Returning From Captivity, Ezra i., 1-11—Golden Text, Psa. cxxv., 3—Memory Verses, 5, 6—Commentary on the Day's Lesson.

I. The proclamation of King Cyrus to return (vs. 1-4). 1. "First year of Cyrus." That is his first year as sole king at Babylon. He was king, twenty years before this, of Elam and gradually extended his empire over the Persians and Medes, Babylonians and Chaldeans. For two years after the capture of Babylon Darius was king of Babylon, under Cyrus. Now Cyrus reigned at Babylon. "Word of the Lord." See Jer. 25:12; 29:10. The promise was that after seventy years the Lord would bring His people again to Palestine. "Stirred up—Cyrus." There is good reason to accept the Jewish tradition according to Josephus, that Daniel, occupying a high position in the court of Cyrus, brought to his attention the prophecies of Isaiah, which name Cyrus as God's servant (Isa. 44:26-28; 45:1-4), and perhaps, also, the prophecies of Jeremiah, showing that God had for this purpose given Babylon into the hands of Cyrus. "Made a proclamation." See chapter 6. "In writing." To prevent any mistake or reversal.

2. "God of heaven." Hence the Controller of all men and affairs. "God of heaven" seems to have been a usual title of the Supreme Being among the Persians. At this time the Medo-Persian empire was very extensive, extending on the east to the Red Sea, on the north to the Black Sea, on the west to the Island of Cyprus and Egypt and on the south to Ethopia. "Hath charged me," etc. Cyrus probably accepted the prophecy of Isaiah as a charge to build the temple. "The existence of predictions in which, 200 years before he was born, his victorious career and the important services he should render to the Jews were foretold, led him to acknowledge that all his kingdoms were gifts bestowed on him by 'the Lord God of heaven,' and prompted him to fulfill the duty which had been laid upon him long before his birth. This was the source and origin of the great favor he showed to the Jews." 3. "Who is there among you." The return was to be a volunteer movement. "His God be with him." A pious wish, indicating the deep religious feeling and goodness of heart which characterized Cyrus alone of Persian monarchs. He ruled his subjects like a father. No nobler character appears in ancient history. "Let him go." As the carrying away of the Hebrews had taken place at intervals of from seventy to fifty years before, there were but few of the original exiles remaining, and it is somewhat remarkable that so many of their descendants, nearly 50,000 in all, should be willing to go to a country they had never seen. "Build the house." This was their great errand, not to build their own houses, but the house of God. "He is the God." We can understand this great truth far more clearly than could Cyrus. Let us see to it that we live out the knowledge which we possess.

4. "Whosoever remaineth." Some persons of true and eminent piety so situated that they did not deem it their duty to go, as Daniel in the court of Cyrus; others were hindered by old age. Many more returned than we read of being carried away captive. "Let the men—help him." Let the heathen population help him. "Free will offering." Probably that made by Cyrus himself.

II. The captives make preparations for the return (vs. 5-11). 5. "Chief of the fathers." Venerable men, heads of families, some of whom had seen the first temple. "Judah and Benjamin." These tribes, last exiled, were the first to return. But that there were many from the other tribes also who returned appears from many other passages. 6. "Strengthened their hands." Their neighbors helped them and contributed liberally. 7. "Cyrus—brought forth," etc. Nebuchadnezzar little thought that he was unconsciously preserving the sacred vessels of Israel in a safe and inviolable stronghold, till the day when Jehovah would bring about their restoration to His people.

8. "Sheshbazzar." The Chaldee or Persian name of Zerubbabel, given him at court as other names were given to Daniel and his friends. Born in Babylon and named by his friends Zerubbabel (exile in Babylon). He was recognized as hereditary prince of Judah; was leader of the first company of exiles and director of the rebuilding of the temple.

11. "All the vessels," etc. This number, 5400, is more than double the sum of verses 9 and 10, which was 2499. It is probable that only the larger or more costly vessels were numbered in detail, and the 5400 includes a great number of smaller and less costly ones. So they are reckoned by Josephus. In the history of the restoration of the Jews to their country, the names of three Jewish leaders and of three Persians are prominent. The first Jewish leader was Zerubbabel, who left Babylon under this proclamation of Cyrus, B. C. 536, seventy years after the first captivity. After an interval of about twenty years he was enabled to complete the rebuilding of the temple, in the reign of Darius Hystaspes, seventy years after the destruction of the temple. The second Jewish leader was Ezra, who went up from Babylon about eighty years after Zerubbabel, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. He labored chiefly to restore the institutions of Moses. The third Jewish leader was Nehemiah, who went up from Susa, or Shushan, in the twentieth year of the same Artaxerxes. He rebuilt the wall and set up the gates of Jerusalem and promoted many reforms.

MILLIONS FOR McCURDYS

Family Got $4,500,000 From Mutual in Twenty Years.

REVELATIONS ASTOUND HEARERS

Young Robert Tells How He Advanced From $1500 a Year Salary in 1881 to $137,000 a Year Income—Louis A. Thebaud, President McCurdy's Son-in-Law, Had Rich Pickings.

New York City.—In an examination replete in details so surprising as to astound even the hitherto imperturbable Mr. Hughes, it was shown before the legislative insurance commission that the stupendous sum of $2,692,931.30 had been received by two members of the McCurdy family, Robert H., a son of the President, and Louis A. Thebaud, a son-in-law, from the Mutual Life in less than twenty years, and information in the hands of the committee shows that the President himself, Richard H. McCurdy, received in salaries alone approximately $1,500,000 in the same period. The vast sums received by the younger members of the family were mainly through commissions for foreign and domestic insurance, as well as for salary, and the net income of the three members of the family from the Mutual Life in 1904 approximated $420,000.

The progress of Robert H. McCurdy from a minor clerkship to a position with an income far in excess of that of the President of the United States made a story the main feature of which was the almost fabulous dimensions of the sums received. Entering the firm of C. H. Raymond, a general agent of the Mutual, at twenty-two years old, fresh from college, at a salary of $1000, Mr. McCurdy testified that in the first ten years of his connection with the Mutual his income from it amounted to more than $200,000, that ten years after his entrance he received in a single year commissions on foreign and domestic business aggregating $110,000 and that in that year he was receiving one-half the profits of the firm, which he entered one year after he began life insurance work. In 1886 he went abroad to organize the foreign agency of the Mutual, and from that time until recently he received vast commissions on all renewal business, commissions so stupendous, in fact, that he had voluntarily asked that they be reduced. How stupendous they really were may be gathered from the fact that his receipts from this source alone in 1903, when he had just been made general manager at a salary of $30,000, amounted to $90,000, and he was still drawing income from insurance written while he was a member of C. H. Raymond & Co., although in this year the amount had become insignificant.

Amazing as was this revelation, dwarfing the remarkable exploits of even George W. Perkins in the realm of insurance revenues, the developments that followed regarding Louis A. Thebaud, Mr. McCurdy's brother-in-law, were even more startling. In 1892 Mr. McCurdy left the firm of C. H. Raymond & Co., still drawing therefrom commissions on renewals, and the next year Mr. Thebaud entered the firm. His progress in the firm established new records in insurance rapid transit. Up to 1896 he had a quarter interest, to 1902 one-half, to 1903 two-thirds, and at the present time three-quarters. In 1902 this netted $12,000, and last year it was upward of $148,000, his total receipts in eleven years being $932,000. The figures for this income of Thebaud were supplied by C. H. Raymond himself. Moreover, to this firm of C. H. Raymond & Co. the Mutual allowed ninety-six per cent. on first year premiums of insurance in the New York district, and guaranteed this on a business of $17,000,000 written annually, agreeing to pay on this basis without regard to the possibility of the actual amount written falling below this.

Mr. Hughes finally obtained from the company's counsel a transcript of the cashier's payroll, which showed that since 1901 Richard A. McCurdy, as president of the Mutual, had been receiving $150,000 a year, a sum three times greater than that paid to the President of the United States.

The final figures show that Richard A. McCurdy, his son, Robert H. McCurdy, and his son-in-law, Louis A. Thebaud, since their official connection with the Mutual Life Insurance Company have jointly drawn from the treasury of that organization in the form of salary and commissions an aggregate of $4,534,120.49 as their personal emoluments.

TO KIDNAP ROCKEFELLER

Pat Crowe Planned to Hold Oil King For $2,000,000 Ransom.

Startling Confession of the Man Under Arrest in Montana For Stealing the Son of a Millionaire Packer.

Butte, Mont.—That plans had been laid to kidnap John D. Rockefeller and hold him for a ransom of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, and that the scheme was not executed because of the timidness of one of the plotters at the last moment, was asserted by Pat Crowe, the notorious outlaw, under arrest here for his connection with the kidnaping of the Cudahy boy.

So startling in its boldness was the plan to steal the Standard Oil man that those who heard of it were inclined to laugh at first. But as the boldest bandit of this section of the country told the details and circumstances of his visit to Cleveland and the preparations that had been made for the greatest kidnaping in the history of the country, all doubt as to the truth of the story Crowe told vanished.

He dazed the public by uttering this amazing story through the bars of his cell:

"I planned to kidnap John D. Rockefeller and get his son to give me $2,000,000 as a ransom!

"It was immediately after the Cudahy kidnaping that my partner and I—never mind his name—were lying low in Chicago, laughing at the excitement over the affair. It had been so easy that I suggested that we go after bigger game, with the result that within a week we took the train to Cleveland to kidnap Rockefeller.

"We got down there, went out to his place at Forest Hill, and sized up the place. The old man was there.

"We planned to hold up the watchman, gag him and get into the house at night—we had a plan of the entire place—and arranged to hustle the old man into a rig and spirit him away.

"We scheduled the job for Wednesday night. About 6 o'clock my partner said he wasn't feeling well and asked me to put it off until the next night. Well, I put it off and at noon the next day, Thursday, he broke down and said he thought we were being watched. That settled it. I began to fear he was going to betray the Cudahy affair, so I hurried to New York, and from there went to South Africa.

"Rockefeller is holding up the world and getting his ransom, too," added Crowe. "Why shouldn't I make him pay if I have the chance?

"I'm not the originator of the ransom business. Caesar was the boss kidnaper. When he was running the world he used to send Brutus and some of his generals over to Carthage, grab one of the big men of that country, and make them put up several millions before they gave him back. They call it kidnaping nowadays. In those days it was statecraft.

"Rockefeller is the oldest child I ever had designs on.

"Maybe," continued Crowe with a sickly smile, "I'll get the old man yet."

Curious crowds filled the jail, anxious to see Crowe. Many women carried fruit and bouquets to the prisoner.

ARRESTED FOR SCHOOL GRAFT.

Professor Dougherty, Peoria's Superintendent, Accused of Forgery.

Peoria, Ill.—The arrest on a forgery charge of Professor Newton C. Dougherty, Peoria's foremost citizen, former President of the National Educational Association, banker, School Superintendent, and friend of Nicholas Murray Butler, of the Columbia University, of New York, has furnished this city with the most amazing sensation in its history.

A second indictment, charging him with the embezzlement of $3000, was returned against Mr. Dougherty, and it is now said the stealings will reach the $250,000 mark, and perhaps more.

The authorities declare they have evidence to show that Dougherty's life has been a living lie; that while posing as the apostle of civic righteousness, preaching education and good morals, he has appropriated money entrusted to him in a business capacity.

Professor Dougherty has resigned as President of the Peoria National Bank, thereby staying a "run." He also sent in his resignation as superintendent of schools and as director in the various commercial institutions in which he is interested.

Dougherty was one of the pillars of the First Congregational Church and a member of every club of importance in the city, as well as the Union Club, of Chicago.

Fairhaven, Vt. — Eight men were killed and several were injured in a cave-in of the Vermont Slate Company's quarry in the town of Pawlet, four miles from Granville. "The Bright Weather of the Heart"

By Samuel Smiles.

CHEERFULNESS is an excellent wearing quality. It has been called the bright weather of the heart. It gives harmony of soul, and is a perpetual song without words. It is tantamount to repose. It enables nature to recruit its strength; whereas worry and discontent debilitate it, involving constant wear and tear.

How is it that we see such men as Lord Palmerston, growing old in harness, working on vigorously to the end? Mainly through equanimity of temper and habitual cheerfulness. They have educated themselves in the habit of endurance of not being easily provoked, of bearing and forbearing, of hearing harsh and even unjust things said of them without inflaming in undue resentment, and avoid worrying petty and self-tormenting cases.

So far as can be learned from biography, men of the greatest genius have been for the most part cheerful, contented men—not eager for reputation, money or power—but relishing life, and keenly susceptible of enjoyment. Such seem to have been Homer, Horace, Virgil, Montaigne, Shakespeare, Cervantes. Healthy, serene cheerfulness is apparent in their great creations. Among the same class of cheerful-minded men may also be mentioned Luther, Penn, Bacon, Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael and Michael Angelo. Perhaps they were happy because constantly occupied, and in the pleasantest of all work—that of creating out of the fulness and richness of their great minds.

Sir Walter Scott was a man full of the milk of human kindness. Everybody loved him. He was never five minutes in a room ere the little pets of the family, whether dumb or lisping, had found out his kindness for all their recreations. Scott related to Captain Basil Hall an incident of his boyhood which showed the tenderness of his nature. One day a dog coming towards him he took up a big stone, threw it, and hit the dog. The poor ceature had strength enough left to crawl up to him and lick his feet, although its leg was broken. The incident, he said, had given him the bitterest remorse in his after-life; but, he added, "An early circumstance of that kind, properly reflected on, is calculated to have the best effect on one's character throughout life."

The Real Peril in Language

By Professor Lounsbury, of Harvard.

IT is no infrequent remark that in these latter days there exists a distinct tendency toward lawlessness in usage, a distinct indisposition to defer to authority. We are told that the language of the man in the street is held up as the all-sufficient standard. If this statement were ever true, it was never less true than now. There might have been apparent justification for an assertion of this sort in the great creative Elizabethan period. Then restraints upon expression seem to have been recognized outside of the taste or knowledge of the writer. As a consequence, the loosest language of conversation was reproduced with fidelity in the speech of the drama, then the principal national literature. But nothing of this freedom is found now. The constant supervision ever speech is exercised by the amateur champions of propriety who are ensconced at every fireside. In colleges and academies and high schools an army of instructors, assumed to be experts, are regularly engaged in holding in check any attempt to indulge in real or supposed verbal solecisms.

It is therefore, from the quarter of license, that any real danger to our English comes. If peril exists at all, it comes from the ignorant formalism and misplaced precision which wage perpetual war with the high-honored idioms of the tongue, or array themselves in hostility to its natural development.

THE LABOR WORLD.

A training school for carpenters has been started by the Reading Carpenters' Union.

These are the days when no really skilled laborer in New York is seeking a job. In fact, there's more work in town for such men than they can do.

The Pattern Makers' League of North America, in session at Pittsburg, Pa., raised the assessment of the members from twenty-five to fifty cents a week.

Among the propositions defeated at the recent convention of the International Typographical Union was a resolution declaring against the National Guard.

A general strike in the electrical works at Berlin was ordered; many employes of the power companies joined the movement, and the street car service was hampered.

Sympathetic strikes in Chicago probably will be more prevalent in the near future through an alliance between the teamsters and the railway freight handlers. The name of the new federation is the Shipping Trades Alliance.

Six thousand union carpenters in Boston and its vicinity have had their wages advanced twenty-eight cents a day. The change becomes operative under a decision of Judge George L. Wentworth, of the Municipal Court, as arbitrator, given about a month ago. The Master Carpenters' Association has agreed to accept the Judge's decision.

The Putiloff Iron Works, which have continued as the principal source of industrial disorders in St. Petersburg since the beginning of the movement started by Father Gapon, were finally closed, after a two weeks' warning to that effect. A small crowd of workmen and agitators attempted to make a demonstration, and a bomb was thrown, which failed to explode. The manifestants were dispersed by Cossacks.

Body Was in Trunk.

The body of Ramon Carmona, a merchant, was found in Havana, Cuba, in a locked trunk beneath a stairway in the store. Jose, a youth employed there, is missing, and so is $2000 belonging to Carmona, which was in the safe.

Norway Adopts Dissolution Agreement

Garrett is Stabbed.

Gadsden, Ala.—A very serious and what may prove to be a serious cutting affray took place Thursday night about 7 o'clock at the home of P. M. Bomar, on South Fourth street. It seems from the best information obtainable that Bomar, who is a carpenter, went home in an intoxicated condition, and soon after his arrival there became involved in a row with a man named James Garrett, who boarded with Bomar, in which Bomar pulled his knife and stabbed Garrett in the left breast, producing a dangerous wound. As soon as he had stabbed the man Bomar left and is still at large. Garrett walked to town and had the wound dressed and went to the home of William Fleming, where he is in a serious condition.

Accidentally Shot Himself.

Birmingham, Ala.—J. J. Dickson, formerly a well-known insurance man of this city, accidentally shot and killed himself Tuesday night in New Orleans. He mysteriously disappeared from Birmingham July 10, and the first information as to his whereabouts was a telegram announcing that he had shot himself.

Fire in Brewton.

Brewton, Ala.—At 9 o'clock Friday fire dstroyed the roof of J. M. Davidson's residence, on Parker avenue. The fire originated from a chimney and started in the attic. The entire roof was in flames when the fire department arrived, but by hard work the fire was confined to the roof and prevented from spreading to adjoining buildings. Loss estimated at $1,000, with $700 insurance.

Accident With Convict.

Montgomery, Ala.—News has reached the convict department of the death by accident of one of the men in charge of the Henderson-Boyd Lumber Company, at Richburg. It seems that there had been built a fence pretty close to the logging road of the company, and the men were being hauled along the side of it. It proved to be too close, and in some way it was shown that there was to be an accident. At this several of the men jumped while the train was in motion, one, Masterson Sherman, being killed. He jumped and was killed by coming in contact with the ground.

Fined for Enticing Labor.

Gadsden, Ala.—L. H. Giddens, a white man who has been employed by the Alabama Steel and Wire Company here for a long time, and who quit some time ago to go with a Birmingham corporation, was tried in the mayor's court here Friday on the charge of attempting to entire negro labor from this district and was fined $100. It seems that when Mr. Giddens quit here he attempted to take his labor with him, but there is a law here which prevents a person from enticing labor, and under this law he was arrested and convicted.

Seventh Victim of Feud.

Mobile, Ala.—William Young was killed from ambush while returning to his home at Wheelerville, thirteen miles west of Mobile, as the result of a feud which has continued there for the past twenty-five years, and of which he is the seventh victim.

Will Blow in Furnace.

Gadsden, Ala.—The Eagle Iron Company, of Chattanooga, is assembling the ore, charcoal and other products for the starting up of their charcoal furnace in Attalla, which has been idle for some time. For the past month necessary repairs have been going on at the furnace, and now great quantities of charcoal are being received, while wood to burn in the coke ovens at the furnace is also being hauled in. It is the intention of the company to start the ovens at once and put the furnace in operation December 1. The Attalla furnace has a daily capacity of ninety tons of the very best charcoal iron, and is one of three similar furnaces in the Gadsden district. Over 150 men will be given employment when the furnace starts.

House Burglarized.

Birmingham, Ala.—The home of John B. Allen at Arcadia, Ala., was burglarized Friday. It was reported to the local police with a view of getting a possible clue from some of the local second-hand stores. Among the articles reported missing are the following: One brown coat, one pair of blue-black trousers, one pair of striped trousers, one blue flannel shirt, an undershirt, one black Stetson hat and a pair of shoes.

Another Cotton Mill.

Huntsville, Ala.—The Merrimack Manufacturing Company, it is reported, will soon begin the erection of a third mill in Huntsville. The original plans of the company provide for a series of eight mills and a bleachery, and the company bought enough land for that purpose, besides establishing a system of water works large enough for their mills and a town of 10,000 population.

Rural Carriers Appointed.

Washington, D. C.—Rural routes 2 and 3 ordered established December 15 at Hamilton, Marion county, serving 980 people and 245 houses.

Rural carriers appointed: Gadsden, route 3, Ernest C. Little carrier, James Little substitute; Hopewell, route 1, John W. Smith carrier, Melvin Smith substitute; Town Creek, route 1, William G. Norton carrier, John Vick substitute.

Sidewalk Ordinance.

Tuscaloosa, Ala.—A sidewalk ordinance was presented and seconded at the last meeting of the city council, and after much discussion was laid over until the next meeting. The ordinance provides that all sidewalks in the city limits shall be paved with either concrete, stone or brick, and further, that the paving shall not be less than five nor more than ten feet. The mayor announced that at an early date a franchise would be applied for to lay gas pipes throughout the city. Another company will make the city a proposition to furnish the city with 125 water plugs to furnish artesian water at $40 each per year. Tuscaloosa is in a most prosperous condition, and the city fathers have their hands full.

Breaks Leg While Wrestling.

Gadsden, Ala.—S. N. Gaines, the street overseer, is laid up with his right leg broken just above the ankle. Mr. Gaines was showing a friend a new trick in wrestling, and had all his weight on his right leg, when he gave it an awkward twist, and the bone popped in two. He was given medical attention and is suffering considerably from the accident.

Franchise Is Granted.

Tuscaloosa, Ala.—At a meeting of the city council the proposed electric railroad which will operate between this point and Birmingham was granted a franchise for thirty years by a unanimous vote. The company was represented by J. M. Dewberry, of Birmingham.

Found Dead In Bed.

Gadsden, Ala.—Mrs. J. W. Boone, a highly respected lady living below Gadsden, was found dead in her bed Tuesday morning. Mrs. Boone had retired the night before in her usual good health, but the next morning when her husband attempted to arouse her he was horrified to find her dead. She leaves a husband and four children.

Tuscumbia Court Notes.

Tuscumbia, Ala.—At the present term of the circuit court among the more important cases decided was that of the estate of Hirschel B. Key, who was run down and killed by a switch engine of the North Alabama Railway at Sheffield, for $3,000 damages. The jury awarded the plaintiff $2,000. In the case of Neely Pride, a Nashville drummer, against the Merchants' Bank, of this city, for $500 damages for personal injuries received by the plaintiff, who fell into the excavation made by the defendant for its new bank building on Main street, a verdict was returned for the defendant.

FIERCE HORNED CATTLE.

THE PHILIPPINE TIMARAU HAS NEVER BEEN TAMED.

Natives Afraid to Hunt It, Although It Is the Smallest of the Ox Family—Prof. Worcester's Hard Task in Getting a Shot at One—Can't Be Dropped.

Unpatriotic though it may sound, the American bison was great only in appearance. His shaggy frontlet, his wild eye and his mighty coronet concealed as cowardly a ton of flesh as ever stirred, says the Washington Star.

But even if we have to admit that the big Bos Americanus of the United States is not worthy of honor except as a marvel of the animal world, the Spanish-American war saved our face, for when we acquired the Philippines we acquired with them a buffalo that is the wickedest thing that ever moved on four legs. The Philippine carabao or water buffalo is wicked enough when wild, and even in a tamed state is prone to attack human beings suddenly. But the timarau, although much smaller than the carabao, is so mean and savage that he will search out carabao and kill them for the mere love of killing.

Nobody ever has tamed a timarau Nobody in the Philippines wants to try; indeed, few natives of the Philippines ever want to see one. The fear of the tiger and lion in India and Africa is as nothing compared with the fear of the timarau in the Island of Mindoro.

So deeply rooted is the fear of the furtive, belligerent, relentless little ox that Profs. Worcester and Steere were unable even to find out what kind of beast it was when they visited the Philippines in 1888 on an exploring expedition.

Everybody warned them against the creature, but no two descriptions agreed. Prof. Worcester says that one man solemnly assured them that it had only one horn, which grew straight from the top of its head. Another declared that he had never seen any horns on it, but it certainly had only one eye, which was set right in the middle of its forehead.

These tales spurred them on, and they visited Mindoro, only to search in vain for several months until they found a tribe called the Mangyans, who knew it well. They said that it was like a small buffalo, with straight horns running upward and backward like those of a goat. They expressed great fear of it, and told him it attacked and killed the big water buffalo every time it got a chance, and how it would charge a man whenever it was approached.

Finding out about timarau and finding timarau were two different things. The creatures were so marvellously shy and cunning that, although the party followed trails day after day which showed where whole herds had congregated, they never even caught a glimpse of the animal itself.

At last, after more weeks of hunting, a native tracker led them to a hiding place of timarau; but he did so only after he had forced an agreement that he be permitted to run as soon as he had located the game for the hunters. He pointed into the bushes, whispered "Timarau, senor!" and raced madly away, his face gray with fear.

Prof. Worcester worked his way carefully through the bushes, but could not see the buffalo for a long time, so perfectly was the animal concealed. At last he saw his head and fired, but just as he did so the bull tossed his head and the shot missed him.

"As I fired a second time," says the professor, "there came crashes in the jungle on every side of me. I had walked into a whole herd of timarau without knowing it. One old bull stood his ground and I gave him a bullet in the shoulder. Furiously he whirled around on me. As I pushed the sliding block of my rifle to throw another cartridge into the magazine the mechanism jammed and left me to face a wounded timarau with a useless gun. Why that brute did not charge has always been a mystery to me. I never afterward knew one to fail to do it under similar circumstances. What he did do was to rush madly into the brush after the herd."

Prof. Worcester found his tracker up a tree and had so hard a time coaxing him to come down that they lost the trail.

Despite careful hunting and despite the fact that they were in timarau country, they got no other shot that trip; and it was not until the next trip that Prof. Worcester got one of these buffaloes, and then only by firing half on guess into the bushes where he could see one indistinctly. It is rarely that these little buffaloes are found in any except cover so dense that the hunter must cut his way through it with a knife, foot by foot. This and the fact that if he happens to get within scent of a lurking buffalo the animal will charge him as quick as lightning and gore and trample him to pieces combines to assure the little forest buffalo of Mindoro a long season of immunity.

The natives like the meat of the timarau, and as other food often fails them they are eager enough for it; but they are far too much afraid of these cattle to hunt them, even when they are starving.

Attempts have been made to catch them alive, but the timarau usually kills itself by its wild struggles as soon as trapped, and even if it does not struggle to the death it refuses to eat in captivity. The natives say that even the youngest calves if caught and put to suck with a tame carabao will not only refuse to eat, but will try desperately to kill the foster mother.

The timarau and its cousin, the pretty little anoa of Celebes, are the smallest of the ox family. The biggest, standing higher at the shoulders than even our bison, is the gaur or seladang.

HALF DEER, HALF COW.

Freak Animal Seen in Minnesota Said by Some to Have Horns.

A deer with a cow's tail is northern Minnesota's latest sensation. The animal is not so terrible to look at as was Cass Lake's great hogag, but it is more real. That it has a cow's tail there is no doubt, for forty-five men in an extra gang working on the new extension of the Duluth, Missabe and Northern road saw the mysterious appendage, and more than once.

Some of the more suspicious of the crew stoutly maintain that the deer is a close relation of the devil, and that it also has cow's horns and cloven hoofs. This latter charge cannot be well denied, for the cloven hoof habit is one that all members of the venison tribe are guilty of. There is some doubt about the cow's horns, however.

If the deer is a doe it wouldn't have any horns at all, and if it were a buck it wouldn't have cow's horns, for a cinch. This line of argument was offered to bring the men in question to a reasonable frame of mind, but they gently reminded us that the male members of the cow family sport horns not unlike those of their gentle better halves. Be that as it may, the unholy deer is there, the horns or no horns, it has a cow's tail, or to follow the reasoning of the superstitious ones above quoted, the tail may be the vertebral extension of a buck. The concensus of opinion among those who saw the strange animal, is that it has no horns, and, in this event cow's tail will probably come as near hitting it as anything else.

Several range people within the last few days have had something to say of the freak. They say it has been seen so many times, and by so many men, that there is no doubting the tail part of the story. The animal seems to have inherited certain domestic proclivities along with its badge of civilization, for it has a strong hankering for the society of human beings, or else for the eatables furnished by human beings. Any way, it is never very far from the camp of the Missabe construction gang, and is seen almost daily, both morning and evening. The tail is easily observed, for whenever its owner is frightened the appendage is thrown straight up into the air, standing up four feet or more, like a flagpole, while the deer bounds away. The men are careful to see that no one shoots the animal, for they take a certain pride in it. Attempts are being made to photograph it, and it is even hoped that it may be captured alive.—Minneapolis Tribune.

No Liquor Manufactured, No Jails and Only One Policeman.

There are no manufactories in the country. Each home is a factory and every member of the family a hand.

Shoes are made from goat skins. The long stockings worn over these in wading through the snow are knitted by the women and children, and even the beautiful broadcloth comes smooth and perfect from the hand loom found in every house.

The sweet simplicity of their national costume does away with the necessity of fashion books. Young girls who are about to be married need take no thought as to "wherewithal shall they be clothed." When they array themselves in the wedding garments of their ancestor, two or even three generations remote, they are perfectly up-to-date in the matter of attire.

The simple life is conducive to a state of high morals, higher probably than in any other part of the world. There is not a drop of liquor manufactured on the island and for the 78,000 population there is but one policeman. There is neither a jail nor any place of incarceration for criminals; nor yet of keeping up a court. When a crim could be tried.

The percentage of crime is so small that it does not warrant the expense of keeping up account. When a criminal trial becomes necessary the offender is taken to Denmark to answer to the law for his misdeeds.

The women are among the most advanced in the world. Their Woman's Political league has a membership of 7000, and they enjoy more civil rights than the women of almost any other country, having a voice in all elections save that for members of their legislative body.—The Pilgrim.

Franklin's Bicentenary.

It is certainly discreditable that one of the three Americans who would by popular acclaim be pronounced to be the greatest the country has produced should have received so little formal recognition. The birthday of Washington is practically a national holiday; Lincoln's birthday is a red-letter day in many states; but Franklin, the third in this triumvirate of America's greatest, is denied the honor of a public testimonial to his superlative merits. An opportunity is at hand to make good this neglect. On Jan. 17 next will be the bicentenary of Franklin's birth. The day ought to be celebrated in an appropriate manner in the furthest ends of the country. It would be becoming for Philadelphia to take the lead in doing honor to her adopted son.—Philadelphia Record.

SOUTHERN FARM NOTES.

TOPICS OF INTEREST TO THE PLANTER, STOCKMAN AND TRUCK GROWER.

Nuts on the Farm.

The nut industry is new. So completely so, it scarcely has a nomenclature. Occasionally in the past there appeared on the market an unusual hickory nut, a chestnut of good size, but of indifferent quality; a pecan, long, but thick shelled; and so on. But now this line of work is assuming the importance of an industry.

And just as soon as we realize that nut trees will afford not only pleasure in their care, but also considerable profit, their worth as a cultivated crop will be appreciated and careful attention will be given hem.

Nuts and raisins! What dish is more wholesome or delicious, or healthful? What food have we that combines flesh materials and energy-producing materials so cheaply, so completely?

And now nut trees can be well combined with farming. Think of the roadsides, often for miles, devoid of trees. I can think of nothing that would add more to the value of the farm than nut trees of various sorts along fence rows and the roadsides. Aside from the shade they would make, the improved appearances they would present, would come the commercial value of the crop. Of course this phase would not bring the financial reward that a cultivated, specially formed nut grove would. Still its importance should not be overlooked.

The old roadsides and permanent fence rows and old creeks and branches would be ideal so far as location for walnuts, pecans, chestnuts and hickory nuts.

If you do not care to get nursery stock, plant the nuts, but look after them a little. Keep the weeds down; dig around the young sprouts once or twice a year. A bit of fertilizer will tickle the roots, and a little breeding in this way will bring about a faster growth and a quicker full harvest. Then don't neglect an occasional watch over the young trees as they grow. The caterpillars are enemies; burn them out. Trimming will pay by making a better appearing tree.

By caring for trees in this manner you can expect rather quick returns. In more Northern climates, native walnuts, pecans and hickories will usually bear when they are twelve to fifteen years old.

Chestnuts come in at a still earlier age. In the Southern States most nut trees that have been given some care and attention will produce crops in five or ten years.

The commercial nut orchard should receive attention similarly given to the apple, the peach or the pear; that is, the orchards should be plowed and cultivated; the soil improved in a physical way through the use of legumes, cowpens and clover. Fertilizers should also be added to feed the tree; and what else is needed to make good, vigorous, healthy growth should be done.

What is said here is not a discussion about the commercial nut orchard; a different treatment is needed there. This is a plea for nuts on the farm; a side issue that will mean good results in many ways. It means a larger idea of the farm. We have looked too long on the farm as a corn or wheat or cotton producer. Let us look on it as the great American institution, and let us grow nuts to help make that institution complete.—C. W. Burkett, in the Progressive Farmer.

"How My Cow Pays."

The following is from the Southern Ruralist. The hint about keeping wet sacks over and about the milk is a good one, the evaporation would keep down the temperature several degrees.

"I have but one cow, but I will tell you how I manage the business on a small scale. My cow is not a full blood. She has some Jersey and some Holstein blood mixed in her. I feed her night and morning with about a peck of hulls, one quart of cottonseed meal and two quarts of bran. She has a good Bermuda pasture to graze on in the day. In winter I feed the same, with plenty of shucks or hay.

"I milk at 5 o'clock in the morning and at 6 at night, during the summer. In the winter at 6 in the morning and 5 in the evening. I always carry a two-gallon bucket of water and wet the hulls and meal good before she eats them. I think that eating dry hulls and meal causes many cows to die with what is called dry murrain.

"I have a good stall to keep her out of all bad weather, and I milk her thoroughly. Leaving milk in the udder causes a cow to soon go dry. I take my calf away from the mother when a few days old and teach it to drink milk. When it is two or three weeks old I teach it to drink buttermilk. The first calf I ever raised was raised entirely on buttermilk after it was one month old.

"I keep my cow in full flow until nearly time for her to come in again. Then I milk once a day and have to keep it up until she calves. She is never dry. We are never without milk more than twenty days. I salt her every time I feed, mixing it thoroughly in her feed.

"I have sold 360 gallons of sweet milk since the 21st of October at sixteen cents per gallon, making $57.12. I have had plenty of milk and butter for home use and sold $16.50 worth of buttermilk and butter, making a total of $73.62.

"Sold my butter and buttermilk at home; received twenty cents for butter and ten cents a gallon for buttermilk. I sent my sweet milk to the city.

"She gives about three and a half gallons per day. Now, if I could have gotten forty cents a gallon for my sweet milk I could have realized a nice sum from my cow.

"The main point is feeding and milking regularly, and milking clean, to keep your cow in full flow.

"My cow is now giving me three and a half gallons and her calf is eight months old. I feed her one sack of cottonseed meal and one of bran every month, and 300 pounds of hulls, making the cost of feeding through summer $3.35 per month. In winter hay and shucks will run the cost to about $5 a month. I have made clear on my cow since the 21st of October about $40, besides having all the milk and butter for home use.

"I have a home-made dairy under a big shade tree, covered with sacks, and keep water on top with woolen strings in it to feed the water down and keep the sacks wet, and I certainly do have good milk and butter. I gave the plan for making it in the Sunny South."

Sheep.

The Planter's Journal has the following to say of sheep:

Hogs are probably the best paying animals to grow on average farms, but in some respect sheep are preferable. This is especially true on upland farms that are too much worn or depleted of humus to produce staple crops in paying quantities. Such fields, if fenced for sheep and converted into a pasture for them, will yield a greater net return than if cultivated, and at the same time become more fertile, for it is a true saying that the foot of the sheep fertilizes the land. While improving the soil, they also improve the herbage of the pasture by exterminating the weeds.

It is claimed for sheep that they make larger relative gains for food consumed than any other kind of live stock. Another claim set up for them is that the annual clip of wool will pay for the expense of keep. Perhaps this is a little overdrawn, except under very auspicious circumstances, which can only be brought about by more judicious management than usually obtains on farms where mixed husbandry is the practice.

They require less attention during winter in the matter of housing and feeding, but they should be looked after pretty closely at lambing time, as some mothers ignore their young at first, and require to be penned with their lambs for a few days in order to get them to recognize the obligations of motherhood.

The objection to allowing sheep and neat cattle to run in the same pasture can only apply to restricted areas where the stock is unduly crowded. One of the most decided advantages in raising sheep is that it requires less manual labor, the most expensive feature of farming, than cultivated crops, but this is applicable to live stock generally, and to sheep in a more eminent degree.

An important, if not the most important, essential for profitable sheep husbandry is the proper selection of breed for the desired end and the use of pure bred rams.

Potato Vines, Effect on Secretion of Milk.

S. W. Everitt, Stella, N. C.—Please answer through your paper the following question: Do potato vines have a tendency to stop the flow or dry up the milk in a sow that is suckling a litter of pigs? Or will any bad results follow the pigs? I am told here that I cannot raise pigs if the sows are fed on sweet potato vines. I can't see any reason in it, as they will produce meat and butter in a cow.

Answer—I see no reason why the use of sweet potato vines as a feed for a nursing sow should dry up the milk; nor do I believe such would be the result. I suspect that such belief is one of those traditions that have been handed down from father to son with no more foundation in fact than the belief of the influence of the moon on germination of seeds and the productiveness of crops. I do not think a litter of young pigs would thrive if the sow and pigs get nothing but potato vines.—Knoxville Tribune and Journal.

The Wind and the Valley

A wild wind roamed the world,
Rebellious, strong, and free;
It hewled its discords long and loud,
O'er mountain, plain, and sea.

Through spaces vast it swept,
Nor paused as on it flew,
And chaos dire e'er marked its track,
But still it onward blew.

A valley sweet it found,
With peaceful sunshine filled.
It swept between the circling slopes,
With joy its heart was thrilled.

The valley spurned it not,
But loving greeting gave.
No longer wild, rebellious, sweeps
That wind o'er land and wave.

The valley sweet art thou,
Who greeting gave to me.
The wild wind, now no longer wild—
Content to rest in thee.

THE WAYS OF FATE

BY LULU J. POWERS

(Copyright, 1905, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

"Ten o'clock," said Emogene Gray, glancing at her watch as she impatiently walked up and down the little platform in front of the dingy country station. "What perverse fate sent me here to this out of the way place anyhow? This extension cuts off forty miles, but then it would have been better to have gone around, as the trains are so irregular that one is liable to come at any moment or it might not come until night. In that case I shall miss the connection and be too late for the wedding." She looked at the track which wound down a sandy bottom and up a hill slope and lost itself among the green of the pines, and then at the straggling village houses, turning at length with a sigh of impatience and entered the bare little waiting room. The only other passengers was a deaf old minister and his partly blind wife.

The former sat upon one of the long benches which were tacked to the wall, his hands folded before him, the picture of patience while his old wife dozed in the corner. Everything was still and quiet, and at length the old minister spread his handkerchief over his bald head and was soon snoring lustily.

Emogene went outside and walked up and down. After a time she sat down upon the edge of the platform, and had just given herself up to reflection when a firm step upon the platform aroused her and she looked up. The tall handsome man who had just stepped up on the platform was in the act of opening a letter, as their eyes met; he crumpled the letter and pushed it into his pocket.

"Emogene!—Can it be possible!" he exclaimed, going up to her and taking her hand in his.

A flood of crimson swept over her face and left it pale. "Why, Robert!" she exclaimed, a glad light leaping into her eyes. For an instance they were both silent. It has been said that people forget—that hearts grow cold—even learn to hate; but when kindred soul meets soul, no matter how deep the gulf between the wild sweet joy of the heart springs to the eye. "Your husband!" he at length found voice to ask, "where is he?"

"Dead," drawing her hand from his and turning her eyes away.

He took her hand and drew it through his arm as they strolled out under the trees which overshadowed the road. The old minister who had roused from his nap and looked out the door. "Humph!" he muttered, "a meeting of old lovers—but it is the way of youth," and humming the air of an old love song he went and sat beside his wife, and drawing her white head over upon his shoulder kissed her.

"Your coming into my life, Emogene, was an inspiration—a vista of joy, followed by deep misery and anguish. We cannot guide our hearts; they spring from us without our will or consent. I knew from the first that you were the promised wife of another, and yet my heart went out to you, and I fancied at times that you cared for me also. My uncle and aunt had no tenderness in their natures, and cared for little but making money. I had been left an orphan upon their bounty, and my life was never a happy one. You went away with the rest of my aunt's summer boarders, and after a time I heard of your marriage. My aunt's keen eyes read my secret, and she taunted me, telling me that you had but amused yourself at my expense. My heart could not bear her taunts, for it was full to bursting, so I left the farm and went out into the world. It was a tough old battle, and many times I was on the verge of despair, but I thought of you and held on, even though I knew that you were dead to me. A year ago both my aunt and uncle died and as they could not take their money with them they willed it to me. Now, sweetheart, tell me of yourself."

Walked up and down.

"You know," she said sadly, "that I too was an orphan and owed everything to my husband—that man I married. He was years older than I, but he was a noble man. Two years after we married he had some financial reverses and the worry preyed upon him and in less than a year he left me, and since that time I have acted as governess in numerous families. Now I am on my way to attend the marriage of an old school friend."

"Quite a coincidence," he said, his face growing white. "I too am on my way to attend a marriage."

"Well, that is singular," she said.

"You must marry me at once."

"What worries me, though, is that if I am not in time I shall offend an old friend. Sarah wanted me to come last week, and if this train makes me lose my connection she will hardly forgive me. I must confess, however, that I am a little curious to know who the bridegroom will be, as she writes me such strange letters, and has never told me the name of the chosen one yet, although she has written a lot about him. But then Sarah Ashton is always somewhat frivolous, though always good-hearted."

"Sarah Ashton!" exclaimed Robert Halladay, trembling so that he caught the post of a fence to steady himself. "Good God, Emogene! I am the expected bridegroom!" he groaned. "I can never keep my vows now that I know you are free. Until this hour I thought you were dead to me—another man's wife. Now you shall be mine!" He caught her hand in his.

She pushed him away from her, her face as white as his own. "Your honor and duty demand that you keep your word, that you hasten to Sarah Ashton and make her your wife."

"Darling, can you send me from you when I love you so," holding out his arms to her, "when I long for you—dream of you and want you always."

"Good-bye!" though her face was trembling and her very heart bursting, she turned away from him and walked over to the hotel. She could not continue her journey, her soul would not bear it; she must have rest.

Half an hour passed. Along in the seclusion of the little dingy room she gave vent to her feelings and great bursting sobs shook her frame. After a time she grew calmer and sank upon her knees. "Great God!" she prayed, "give me strength to do my duty, and help me to forget this day."

Just then a rap sounded upon the door.

Emogene arose and bathed her face before she opened the door. As she opened it Robert Halladay stepped into the room and took her in his arms. "Good news, darling," he said, kissing her again and again. "Read this," holding a letter before her astonished eyes.

It was but a few lines in Sarah Ashton's irregular, well known scrawly hand as follows:

Dear Friend:—Doubtlessly you will be greatly surprised, but I hope not greatly grieved when you learn that I have eloped and am happily married this morning to Mr. Smith. We were engaged and loved each other years ago, but paternal authority separated us, etc, etc. Yours in friendship,

SARAH SMITH.

"Now, sweetheart, as I cannot be a jilted lover, you must marry me at once."

"Why! How—"

He stopped her mouth. Half an hour later the old minister performed the ceremony in the hotel parlor, and when the delayed train pulled out from the platform it bore two happy, satisfied hearts away upon their bridal tour.

HIS EDITORIAL QUICKLY READY.

New York Paper Tells Good Story on Southern Journalist.

A certain editorial writer on the staff of a Southern newspaper was inclined to dilatoriness during certain periods of conviviality, and caused thereby much concern in the breast of the foreman of the composing room just prior to the moment when the forms must go to press. But the writer was a part owner of the paper and could not well be discharged, since he occupied the position of managing editor. Many times the editorials were late and the paper delayed in going to press, but the delinquent writer always made good after a fashion. Finally he hit upon a scheme when he was called upon at the last moment for "copy" that may, in all justice to expediency, be called the art of genius.

The hour was very late and no leading editorial had gone to the composing room. In frantic haste the foreman sent for the editorial writer, and only after half an hour was he located—in a near-by saloon and much the worse for his dalliance there. He grasped the intelligence that he had forgotten his leading column, and made his way as fast as he could to his office. Snatching a piece of copy paper in one hand, he caught up a copy of the New York Times with the other, and from it clipped a leading editorial, which he pasted on the paper. Then he wrote:

"We cannot agree with the New York Times when it says:"

The editorial of the Times was copied, the paper went to press, and the editor back to the saloon.—New York Times.

Cheat the Elephants.

"Billiardists who have been afraid the scarcity of ivory would kill the game have another guess coming," said an old player, as he chalked his cue the other day. "I've been playing with billiard balls made of artificial ivory, which was so nearly like the kind the elephants furnish that you wold not notice the difference. Elephants are getting pretty scarce, you know, and elephant tusks are now almost as rare as genuine Navajo blankets. You know it is only the choicest of tusk ivory that can be used for billiard balls. One year ago regulation two and three-eighth inch ivory balls could be purchased for $8. Now they cost $16 apiece. The advance in the price of ivory was simultaneous with and strikingly similar to the constantly growing value of diamonds. Billiardists have maintained that only with ivory balls could the delights of the game be realized. This meant that within a few years only millionaires, kings, or princes could hope to indulge in the game which dates back to the time of the Pharaohs.

"Yes, sir, they are now making ivory balls that won't catch cold, and they are practically indestructible. They are celluloid and bone and hard rubber and are then sandpapered and polished."

Where Oil Was Needed.

He was dying, so the schoolbook says,
dying in Algiers;
There was lack of antiseptics and dearth of woman's tears;
But a Red Cross man approached him and he murmured soft and low
That up upon his cistern some oil would have to go.
Now, this soldier of the legion knew English words a few,
And to him the sound of "cistern" was not exactly new.
Still the word conveyed but little to his unreceptive mind,
And he asked in simple language for a plain reply in kind.
Then they spoke in accents soothing,
how this oil the germs would kill,
And the wicked stegomyia would become the same as nil.
But still they had to tell him and make it to him plain
That he had been mistaken and that no one who was sane
Could ever think that "cistern" the same as "system" meant—
That never oil—excepting cod—was on the "system" spent.
And so he died a peaceful death and never was dismayed
When ward clubs came in his back yard and kerosene was sprayed.

Copper Exported to China.

More than 22,000 tons of copper have been exported to China from America this year. The unusual quantity has excited attention, and inquiries of the trade have elicited two explanations. One is that a new coinage is necessary in China, because the old has been gradually melted down for the manufacture of cartridges. The other is that the process of smelting the metal is so imperfect that the smelted copper contains small quantities of gold, and this the astute Chinese contrive to extract. Vast quantities of copper disappear constantly in China from one cause or another.

Distinguished College President.

Rev. David H. Buel, the new president of Georgetown University, is a son of Col. David H. Buel, U. S. A. He was graduated from Yale in 1883 and has been successively instructor in classics at Holy Cross college, classics and higher mathematics at St. Francis Xavier college, professor of physics at St. John's college and of physics and mechanics at Georgetown university.

Suspicious.

The following item appeared in the Bacon Ridge Banner:

"One night last June the editor heard someone prowling about in his chicken coop. Not having any shot handy he loaded the gun with quinine pills and blazed away. The intruder was peppered, but managed to crawl away. As there is only one man in the village who has not had the ague this season we have our suspicions."

CRAFTY MAN WINS OUT.

Neat Way in Which He Dupes the "Angel of His Life."

Mr. Smuthe reaches home for dinner and finds his wife in an unusually taciturn mood.

They go through the meal almost quietly; the only speech being from him.

The evening progresses in the same fashion.

At last he asks:

"Aren't you feeling well to-night?"

"Oh, yes," she tells him, coldly.

"Then what is wrong with you?"

"You ought to know."

"How should I know? Have I said or done anything to offend you?"

"No; you haven't said anything or done anything."

"Then what on earth makes you act this way?"

"I suppose you have forgotten what day this is?"

"No. This is the 25th day of August, 1905."

"And it is my birthday, and you forgot that it was, and you never forgot it before, and you——"

"One moment, my dear. I did not forget that it was your birthday."

She smiles through her tears, thinking of diamond sunbursts and things like that.

"Oh, you dear thing!" she exclaims. "You djd not forget it, then?"

"No. What birthday is it?"

"Why, my thirtieth, of course."

"Well, angel of my life, do you not think it is more gracious of me to seem to overlook your birthday than to remind you of how old you are growing?"

Next day she tells the neighbor that dear John is the thoughtfullest man that ever lived.

Young Fool and the Old.

There's no fool like a young fool
When fireworks are concerned—
Behold them all, the victims small,
With hands and faces burned,
Behold the lamed and killed and maimed,
Their needless sufferings;
There's no fool like the Old Fool
Who gives a child such things.

There's no fool like a young fool
In glorious July,
To fire a bomb and lose a thumb
And tear away an eye,
To touch a light to dynamite
And scatter death and noise:
There's no fool like the Old Fool
Who gives a child such toys.

There's no fool like a young fool
To make the Fourth a crime,
When every nurse and every hearse
Is working overtime,
When East and West and North and South,
The lists appalling grow:
There's no fool like the Old Fool
Who thinks a child should know.

There's no fool like the young fool
Who smells the powder smoke;
But the awful play that mars the Day
Has ceased to be a joke,
Yet Satan tempts the Old Fool
To chuckle 'neath his breath
And put among the heedless young
The instruments of death.
—Life.

Forcing the Youthful Mind.

There is very general cry that children are becoming every day less childlike, that they are being pressed far beyond their strength. Of course, the fanatics tell us that it is not so, that all this outcry is the outcome of misplaced sentiment and of ignorance of the true inwardness of educational methods. But this we know, that forced minds are very like forced plants—curiosities, perhaps, but not such as the experienced cultivator keeps as "stock." Nature is very jealous for her nurslings. You may fool considerably with adult specimens, even to the degree of making them hideous; you may experiment almost indefinitely with this, and the other kind of pruning, grafting, but let a cold wave or a hot wave but once blow upon your tender nurslings and they are gone without hope of resurrection. —Philadelphia Ledger.

A Mere Matter of Size.

She was corpulent and on her way to Chicago from New York, and was traveling with her two children, aged respectively 3 and 4 years. As far as Buffalo she had not been asked to pay for the children, but at that point the train crew changed and the new conductor, a gruff, surly-looking individual, looked askance at the children and asked for their tickets.

"Why, I have none," said the mother.

"How old are they?" snapped the man in blue.

"The girl is 3 and the boy 4, sir."

"They look pretty big for that," was the gruff rejoinder.

"Well," said she of the avoirdupois, "if you're collecting fares according to size, you'd better get another ticket for me."

Needless to say, she did not pay for the children.

Plain Spoken.

"I hope, senator," ventured the upright citizen, "that you never allowed anyone to hint about a bribe in your presence."

"I should say not," replied Senator Boodle, with much emphasis.

"Ah, I am so glad to hear it."

"No, sir, I never allowed them to hint because it took up too much time. If they wanted anything crooked done they had to say it right out and then I'd listen."

Old Couple Take Marriage Vows.

George Applegate, an octogenarian of Bethlehem, Pa., the other day took out a license to wed Mrs. Augusta Wahl, also of Bethlehem, and 60 years old. Before doing so he placated his children by giving each of them $30,000. Mr. Applegate is a rich man, and as he says, "will have enough left" for himself and his elderly bride.

Japanese Costumes Popular.

At the fashionable watering places near New York Japanese costume dances are all the rage. This does not necessarily mean general pro-Japanese sympathy among the butterflies of society, who probably would have taken up the picturesque features of Russian costume had the fad struck them that way.

Sailors Have Sport Racing Turtles

Start Big Snappers Across Deck and Bet on Their Finish—Gambler Thinks Track Should Be Built for Them.

"I have heard of horse races, bicycle races, foot races, dog races, and a dozen different kinds of races, but never before in my long life have I heard of a turtle race," mused Lem Fugle, the sage, philosopher and guide of the battery, yesterday afternoon, as he hung his feet over the stern of the tugboat E. S. Booth, and puffed nonchalantly at the pipe of peace.

"Yes," he continued, "that is the story brought in by the steamship Queen Eleanor from Samarang and Aden. A friend o' mine, who is a stoker on the Queen, told me they had a reg'lar Saratoga during the trip over. The sailors bet their money and when that was lost staked their dunnage on races between a score of big snapping turtles, which were brought over by the men simply to have a little sport with.

"On the second day out the sailors dug out a half dozen of the monster snappers and pasted numbers on their backs. Strong ropes were tied around the necks of the turtles, the bets were placed, and the snappers sailed away from the 'post' in a manner much similar to the way the horses leave the scratch line at a race track.

"The after deck of the steamer was made a race track. There was a real bookmaker, and several dollars of real money changed hands. The heavy losers wailed and declared No. 3 or No. 6 was a dead one, and could not get around the track unless it was carried."

Lem Fugle refilled his pipe and looked wistfully at the entries in tomorrow's races, carefully picking out the winners, and assuring the reporter what a "cinch" Mad Mullah would be "for show."

"I have gambled on every kind of race that has ever been run, with the exception of the turtle race," spoke the sage in a sorrowful tone, "and I think it is up to the sports of New York to build a track for racing the crust covered creatures. You can put me down on the list as a charter member of the Metropolitan Turtle Racing association," said Mr. Fugle, and the tugboat E. S. Booth left her mooring at Pier No. 4, East river, and started down the bay for a tow.—New York American.

Charles Wesley's Seven Thousand Hymns

Founder of Church Indefatigable in His Sacred Writings—Commenced at the Age of Twenty-nine.

Wonder is always expressed and doubts arise when the statement is made that the Rev. Charles Wesley, a clergyman of the Church of England, actually wrote seven thousand hymns during his lifetime. This statement is verified by the publication over his own signature of thirty-nine books of poetry, sacred and secular. It is doubtful if there exists a hymn book adopted by any religious denomination which does not contain several of his sacred songs.

Thomas Moore wrote very few sacred songs, but of these few one stands out pre-eminent and will be sung till time be no more by the people of this whole earth. "This song, that always reaches the heart, is "Come, Ye Disconsolate," found in almost every hymn book and never accredited to the author.

The Rev. Charles Wesley must have been writing hymns all his life, and it is recorded of him that he wrote on horseback while traveling from place to place upon his duties in the church. In those days graphite pencils and flowing pens were unknown, and he wrote with a piece of soft lead he always carried with him on any old scrap of paper. He lived to be 80 years of age, and was born in 1708.

The hymns of Dr. Watts come next in number to those of Charles Wesley, namely, 697, but they mostly appealed to children, although never forgotten in later years.

The fact is that Wesley commenced writing his sacred hymns at the age of 29.

The Methodist hymn book in this country, as well as the Wesleyan hymn book in England, being so replete with the hymns of Charles Wesley is accounted for by the fact that both Charles and his brother John were clergymen of the Church of England, but John, taking exception to some part of the ritual of that church, went out to preach to the multitudes, and after he had organized what his followers called the Wesleyan church his brother Charles joined him and wrote the hymns, to which were added the favorite hymns of other sacred writers.

Was Down on Circumstantial Evidence

Man Arrested for Complicity in Bank Robbery Had Reasons for His Belief—Unfortunate in Love Affairs.

"As to circumstantial evidences, it's a queer thing," said the man in the brown suit. "Five or six years ago I was in a certain town for a night when a bank was robbed. Next morning I was arrested as an accomplice, it being contended that I was seen idling in front of the bank and evidently acting as sentinel to those within. Three different persons identified me as the man, and a fourth claimed to have seen me enter the hotel at a late hour by way of a shed and a window. I was locked up for examination, and with a chance of things going hard with me, when evidence began to come forward on my side.

"The landlord asserted and swore that I was sitting in the office at 10 o'clock p. m. Two servants swore they saw me going to my room half an hour later. A man having rooms opposite the hotel swore that he saw me smoking at my window at midnight. A guest of the hotel who had a room next to mine swore that my snores disturbed him from midnight till 2 o'clock and that he heard me turn over in bed at 3, and so I was honorably discharged from custody."

"But about it being queer?" was asked.

"Why, all the people on both sides were mistaken. I was not outside the bank at the times named and neither was I in the hotel."

"But you were somewhere?"

"Oh, of course. Fact is, I got mashed on the landlord's daughter and we sat up all night in a balcony and talked love and looked at the moonlight. Yes, sir, sat there all night like a couple of idiots, and though I declared I would die for her and she said she only wanted me and a humble cottage, she was married to a red-haired butcher within a year and I was being sued by a snub-nosed widow for breach of promise. I was simply observing, you know, that circumstantial evidence is a queer thing and I wish to add that a juryman shouldn't be influenced too much by it."—Tid-Bits.

Bereaved Husband Needed the Tiger

His Wife Had Recently Died and He Was Seeking Congenial Society—English Newspaper Responsible for Story.

At a sale of animals from a hippodrome a tiger was being offered. The highest bid was made by a man who was a stranger, and to him it was knocked down. The owner of the animal, who had been eyeing the stranger uneasily during the bidding, then went up to him and said:

"Pardon me for asking the question, but will you tell me where you are from?"

"From the country," responded the man.

"Are you connected with any show?"

"No."

"And are you buying this animal for yourself?"

"Yes."

The showman shifted about for a few moments, looking alternately at the man and the tiger, evidently trying his best to reconcile the two.

"Now, young man," he finally said, "you need not take this animal unless you want to, for there are those here who will take it off your hands."

"I don't want to sell," was the quiet reply.

"What on earth are you going to do with such an ugly beast if you have no show of your own and are not buying for someone who is a showman?"

"Well, I'll tell you," said the purchaser. "My wife died about three weeks ago. We had lived together for ten years, and—and I miss her."

He paused to wipe his eyes and steady his voice, and then added:

"So I've bought the tiger."

"I understand you," said the great showman in a husky voice, as he turned to hide his emotion.—London Tit-Bits.

Life's Sorrows That Quickly Pass

"You with Your Chains That Are Riveted Fast, Remember To-morrow This Day Will Be Part of the Past."

I.

By to-morrow this day will be part of the past,
By to-morrow the ache you are thinking must last
As long as winds blow and white rivulets run
As long as the world may be warmed by the sun—
By to-morrow the ache that is deep in your heart
May be gladly forgot, or recalled as the smart
Of a wound that was trifling, and, looking ahead,
You may gaze on fair prospects all fairly aglow
With the loveliest flowers that ever may blow,
Though to-day they gray future seems barren and dead.

II.

The past, lying there with its joys and its woes,
With its wine bottle drained and its poor, withered rose,
With its pledges all broken, its hopes that were vain,
Its moments of gladness, its seons of pain—
The past has not terrors, it cannot return,
'Tis only gray ashes that never may burn.
And you with your chains that are riveted fast
Where the staples of circumstance bulge from the wall,
Be glad—oh, be glad—for, though heaven should fall,
By to-morrow this day will be part of the past.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT..

President Theodore Roosevelt's special train will pass through Clanton on Tuesday afternoon about 3 o'clock, and as the engine will stop to take water, the President will give about ten minutes' audience to the people of Chilton county from the platform of his private car. Arrangements are now under way to decorate the depot and railroad crossing and a big crowd is expected to be on hand to welcome OUR President. This county deserves to be recognized in some way, for it cast a bigger vote for ROOSEVELT and PROSPERITY than any other county in Alabama (in proportion to population). So now turn out and let's give the most prominent MAN among the celebrities of the world a hearty welcome, and speed him on his way to New Orleans, where his presence will give comfort and courage to that sorely afflicted people.

MAPLESVILLE ITEMS.

Zill Castle's little girl suffered a painful wound last week by the accidental discharge of a gun. Most of the cotton has been picked, but is coming in the market very slowly since the price dropped below 10 cents. Mrs. J. S. Martin's father, George Windows, of Texas, is here on a visit. Some building is going on in spite of the high price of lumber. The E. E. Jackson Lumber company, having bought out the Gregory-Coe Lumber Co., some are predicting that Stanton will lose much of its importance when the mill is cut out. Judging from Geo. Fox's speech from Damsky's store porch last Sunday, that concern is worth a million dollars and will NEVER close on Sundays. The Baptist Association at Pleasant Grove last week was quite a success, the attendance being very large, and the best of order prevailed during the entire meeting. Miss Florence Adair will take up the school here November 15th. She paid a flying visit here, but is now at her home in Uniontown for a couple of weeks' rest, she having just dismissed her school at Billingsley. R. C. Hanlin is seeing that Postmaster Glover forwards any mail for her. Col. Foshee and Wylie Mitchell are also frequent visitors at the P. O. Mrs. A. Foshee has been on a visit to her sister, Mrs. James, at Centreville. The Colored Association held a meeting here which lasted a week. The attendance was immense and fine order was preserved. T. U. Crumpton made them a talk on the Holy Land and Rev. Davis preached for them once.

RANDOLPH.

We welcome the correspondent from Jemison in last Union. Just keep coming. V. L. Hubbard is night operator for Randolph now. His family will occupy the house just south of the hotel. He is a Chilton boy—son of D. C. Hubbard, of Jemison. Saturday was horse trading day at this place. Several leaders of the profession were here—Bennett Edwards, Allen Mahan, Tump Reynolds, Tom Glass and Joe Smith, Sr. There was a good crowd present. Miss Fannie Cobb, one of Pleasant Grove's most charming young ladies, was in town last week. Mr. Frank Martin, who was burned out recently, is building a short distance from town. Esquire Martin held court here Monday. Conductor May, of the Southern Railroad, was before the court on a charge of keeping the crossing blockaded for an unnecessary length of time. He was acquitted. James Langston, of Jemison, was in town Saturday. Robert Waldrup, of beat 2, visited relatives here Sunday. Will Redding was in town Saturday. John S. Waldrup, one of the wide-awake and thinking young men of beat 3, was in town Saturday. C. L. Langston, one of the true and tried reformers of beat 2, passed through last week on his return from the Chilton County Association. G. W. Gothard, of Mars Hill, was in town last week on his return from Chilton County Association. We were pleased to meet him. Charlie Seale was a welcome visitor Monday. He is a son of the well-known silver-tongued minister, Thomas Seale, deceased. We welcome the correspondent in last Union from Pleasant Hill. Let all the young readers of The Union strive to grow in knowledge. Le them also seek wisdom. If our memory is correct, Dr. Talmage once said, "Wise people would laugh, and fools would giggle." Oh, how true. So let our young people avoid the wild guffaws of laughter by the immoral and the giggling of fools Let them seek higher things that will make them nobler men and women. Let them seek temperance and cultivate due respect for gravity, remembering the true church is taught to be grave and temperate by the word of inspiration. Remember also that gravity, one of the characteristics of the one true church, does not imply gloom and despondency. No, but happiness indeed. Why hear the sainted D. S. Warner as he describes the beautiful church of the New Testament and alludes to her happiness by saying:

"Far above this world's confusion,
Walking close by Jesus' side,
Leaning on His loving bosom,
Is the church, His chosen bride."

Yes, young people, seek the noble, the good, beautiful and true. Seek the truth and shun the error. Good wishes for The Union.

"ONE OF THE BOYS."

CALERA.

(Special to The Union.)

The conference of the Shelby County Medical Society for the discussion of tuberculosis on the evening of the 11th was well attended and a very instructive program was rendered—essays, speeches and short talks. The music was excellent, such as few towns in the State outside of Calera can render. The order was good, and all who were in attendance went away feeling well repaid for time spent.

We have had two fine rains and three frosts since my last, and everybody is hoping to hear the good news that the yellow fever for this season is entirely abated.

Our town is still in a panic for residence houses. Numbers of families would locate here for the benefit of our school if there were houses to accommodate them. The school is progressing handsomely under the tutorship of Prof. Skinner and Miss O'Hara.

Our people are beginning in earnest to prepare their fuel for the winter. Coal is worth $4.25 delivered at the door.

Cotton being off the past week, is coming in slowly—farmers holding for better prices.

Calera hens are taking on the move which makes the price of eggs high and hard to get.

Every time we hear from Columbiana the "authorities" have increased the cost of the new court house. The latest is "a marble building," with all modern improvements, which means about a $100,000 court house for a $25,000 town. "Nothing like development" when the taxpayers foot the bills! This is the last and criminal week of the fall term of Circuit Court. Maybe by next term the "marble, with all modern improvements" court house will be above ground.

The U. C. V. camp postponed the meeting on the 14th to the 21st, when the subject of visiting Birmingham in a body to take part in the reception of the President will be discussed; also to take in the fair. All members and veterans are requested to be present and join in the procession.

VETERAN.

THORSBY LETTER.

The Rud family arrived here from Minnesota last week with the intention of spending the winter in the south. Mrs. Wright and Mrs. E Snider spent last Wednesday in Clanton. A number of the young people of Thorsby spent a most enjoyable evening with Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Collins on the 11th. Mr. O. Schive took a business trip to Birmingham last Thursday. Mrs. S. A. Thorson came from Calera last Thursday to attend the Swedish Ladies' Aid Society, which was largely attended at the home of her sister, Mrs. L. Reagen. Some of our boys are spending their nights in 'possum hunting. They never return home empty handed. Our baseball team was rather disappointed in not having the Jemison team come on Saturday as they had promised to. They expect to play them at some future date. Many Thorsby people attended the baptizing at Salem church on Friday. Mr. E. Tostenson arrived from Minnesota last week and stopped at the Erdahl home. He left Wednesday for Texas, where he intends to sell out some land he owns there and come back to Thorsby to live. J. J. Stanley sold his livery outfit to W. H. Goodgame. Mr. J. Williams delivered a sermon at Cedar Grove on Sunday. Owing to the illness of Rev. Clark there was no preaching at the Union Protestant church of Thorsby on Sunday. A prayer meeting led by Mr. S. E. Norton was well attended on Sunday night. Friends of Mr. George Freeman will regret to learn that he is very sick with the typhoid fever. Mrs. Hornsby and her children are visiting in Thorsby.

POPLAR SPRINGS.

Editor Union:

Everything is working well in this community. The Sunday school is doing nicely. We had a good meeting of the Weogufka Association at our church on October 4-5. It was enjoyed by all. Everybody is about through gathering their crops. Success to The Union. JUST A FARMER.

MARS HILL.

Crops will soon be gathered. All are marketing their cotton slowly. D. W. Scott and family visited his brothers, Lafayette and Pink, Saturday. J. N. Scott and father attended at Pleasant Hill Saturday and Sunday. Henry Davenport bought a new buggy Saturday. As he is a single man of about 25 years, it does seem as if he ought to have got it while the meetings were going on. There will be a little moving in our settlement shortly, as ten or twelve families will change about.

BIG EXPRESS ROBBERY

A $101,000 Cash Package Stolen From the Adams in Pittsburg,

IT WAS ALL IN SMALL BILLS

Edward G. Cunliffe, a Clerk, Missing—Leaves a Family Behind—Receipted For the Money in Pittsburg When Acting as a "Sub"—Supposed Thief Got Fourteen Hours' Start.

Pittsburg, Pa.—A package containing $101,000 in cash was stolen from the general offices of the Adams Express Company in this city. Edward George Cunliffe, money clerk of the company, and one of its trusted employes, is missing, and the police of every city in the country have been asked to arrest him on the charge of stealing the money.

The package containing the money was made up of $80,000 in $100 bills, $10,000 in $50 bills and the remainder of the money was in $5, $10 and $20 bills.

It was learned that a part of the money had been shipped by the Bank of Pittsburg, and the remainder by the Farmers' National Bank, of this city. From the same source it was learned that the money was consigned to a bank in Cincinnati.

Cunliffe, who received the money after banking hours in the afternoon, left his office at the usual time, about 6 o'clock in the evening. He stopped in the hallway of the building and chatted with several of the other employes before he started for his home. When he reached there he said nothing to his wife, but went direct to his room, where he changed his clothes, putting on a new winter suit. He ate his supper, and then said that he was going out for the evening. He kissed his four children an affectionate goodbye and left the house. That was the last seen of him.

When he did not report for duty next morning nothing was thought of the matter, but when his wife a few hours later called up the office of the company, and asked if he was there the suspicion of the company was aroused. A hurried examination was made of his books, and it was found that his accounts were $5 short. It was fully an hour afterward that a telegram was received from Cincinnati announcing the fact that the package containing the money had not been received there, and asking why it had not been sent. A further examination of Cunliffe's books was made, and it was found that the money which had been intrusted to his care had never been forwarded.

Detective agencies were at once notified, and a search was started for Cunliffe. Fourteen hours had elapsed from the time that he had left his home in the West End until the company was convinced that he was guilty of the theft. There are night trains on both the Pittsburg and Lake Erie and the Pennsylvania Roads for Buffalo, and it was believed by the officers that he had boarded one of these trains, with the hope of reaching the Canadian border before his crime was discovered.

At the little home of the Cunliffe family, in the West End, the members of the family of the man are almost heartbroken. Cunliffe, according to the neighbors, was a most devoted husband and father. He was absolutely free from bad habits of any kind, and all of his time, when not at his office, was devoted to his wife and children.

Cunliffe came to this city in March, 1904, from Hartford, Conn., where all of his relatives live, and where he was held in the greatest esteem. Prior to his connection with the Adams Express Company, he was employed by the American Express Company in Hartford for a number of years, and came to Pittsburg with good recommendations from them. His salary was only $900 per annum.

The company issued the following description of the missing clerk:

"Edward George Cunliffe is thirty-five years of age, looks to be forty; five feet seven inches tall; weight 170 pounds; medium build; dark brown hair, heavily mixed with gray; wears a heavy, short-cropped mustache, dark, and partly mixed with gray; could raise a very heavy beard; has blue eyes. When last seen he wore dark blue, double-breasted sack suit, a black derby hat, turned collar, and a black bow tie. He wears a silver ring with an acorn design. He is an inveterate cigarette smoker, and the second finger of his right hand is badly discolored with nicotine. Cunliffe is afflicted with what is known as the 'cigarette cough.'"

FELT THE APPROACH OF DEATH.

Engineer Stops His Train to Get a Drink of Water and Expires.

Albany, N. Y.—Feeling the approach of death, Engineer Joseph Marks, on a Delaware and Hudson locomotive, stopped his passenger train filled with people as it was approaching Albany. Stepped from the engine to get a drink of water in a switchman's shanty alongside the track and dropped dead as he was raising the cup to his lips. His presence of mind averted a disaster.

Japanese Dead 72,450.

Advices from Japan say the official returns of the casualties of the Japanese Army throughout the war show that 46,180 were killed, 10,970 died from wounds, and 15,300 died from disease, a total of 72,450 dead.

Mutual Money For Republicans.

Officers of the Mutual Life Insurance Company testified that $92,500 of the policy holders' money was contributed to Republican campaign funds in the last three Presidential elections.

Hearst For Mayor.

William R. Hearst for Mayor, John Ford for Controller and J. G. Phelps Stokes for President of the Board of Aldermen is the ticket named by the Municipal Ownership League, of New York City.

A CARD.

To My Neighbors:

Permit me to thank you who, seemingly directed by a Divine hand, on Friday last saved my residence from destruction by fire. The full realization of your neighborly loyalty to me in my hour of need more than compensates me for the total loss of my barn and its contents.

WM. M. ADAMS.

Clanton, Ala., Oct. 77, 1905.

The United States are the chief source of the world's supply for cotton. Our cotton mills have access to the raw material grown almost at their doors. Yet we are apparently unable to sell our cottons in successful competition with European makers in near-by South American markets.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is hit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

Send Us Three Names.

Or five of you may club together, sending a dollar bill and 25 good names and addresses, and get five trial trip subscriptions. Learn how to clip the Trust's wings. Address

SOUTHERN COTTON ASSOCIATION

Chilton Co. Sub-Division.

To Farmers, Landlords and Tenants:

At the meeting of the executive committee of the S. C. A. at Asheville, N. C., the assessment on every bale of cotton grown by members was placed at 3 cents.

At a meeting of the Chilton Co. association the county ex. committee was empowered to enforce this assessment.

The amount is small, and it is hoped that those even not members will co-operate in raising it.

The association has already added millions to the wealth of our country and the price of cotton would likely now rule at 8 cents but for it. The public ginneries are authorized to collect this 3 cents per bale.

GILBERT'S GRAVEL WEED COMPOUND.
The Great Tonic is Guaranteed to Give Satisfaction.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for more sickness and suffering than any other disease; therefore, when, through neglect or other cause, kidney trouble is permitted to continue, fatal results are sure to follow.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorders of these most important organs.

Your other organs may need attention—but your kidneys most, because they do most and need your attention first.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking GILBERT'S GRAVEL WEED COMPOUND, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince any one. Write us for a sample of this famous remedy—will be sent free of charge.

NO TONGUE CAN TELL

How I Suffered With Itching and Bleeding Eczema Until Cured by Cuticura.

"No tongue can tell how I suffered for five years with a terribly painful, itching and bleeding eczema, my body and face being covered with sores. Never in my life did I experience such awful suffering, and I longed for death, which I felt was near. I had tried doctors and medicines without success, but my mother insisted that I try Cuticura. I felt better after the first bath with Cuticura Soap, and one application of Cuticura Ointment, and was soon entirely well. (Signed) Mrs. A. Etson, Bellevue, Mich."

Distinguished Chinese Coming.

Sir Chentung Liang Change, the Chinese minister, has been advised by cable of the appointment at Pekin of special representatives of the various branches of the government who will visit the United States and Europe to make a close study of governmental systems. Most prominent of these officials is Tung Fang, the viceroy of Hunan, who during the Boxer outbreak in 1900 bore a prominent part in the protection of the missionaries.

Grafted on an Eyelid.

A physician at Bordeaux, France, was called on to graft an eyelid on a man whose face had been shockingly burned. As there was no healthy skin left near the eye, he partly severed a piece of skin from the man's left arm and kept the arm in contact with the eye for ten days. The operation was a complete success.

THE CHANGE OF LIFE

INTELLIGENTWOMEN PREPARE

Dangers and Pain of This Critical Period Avoided by the Use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

How many women realize that the most critical period in a woman's existence is the change of life, and that the anxiety felt by women as this time draws near is not without reason?

If her system is in a deranged condition, or she is predisposed to apoplexy or congestion of any organ, it is at this time likely to become active and, with a host of nervous irritations, make life a burden.

At this time, also, cancers and tumors are more liable to begin their destructive work. Such warning symptoms as a sense of suffocation, hot flashes, dizziness, headache, dread of impending evil, sounds in the ears, timidity, palpitation of the heart, sparks before the eyes, irregularities, constipation, variable appetite, weakness and inquietude are promptly heeded by intelligent women who are approaching the period of life when woman's great change may be expected.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the world's greatest remedy for women at this trying period, and may be relied upon to overcome all distressing symptoms and carry them safely through to a healthy and happy old age.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound invigorates and strengthens the female organism, and builds up the weakened nervous system as no other medicine can.

Mrs. A. E. G. Hyland, of Chestertown, Md., in a letter to Mrs. Pinkham, says:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I had been suffering with falling of the womb for years and was passing through the change of life. My womb was badly swollen. I had a good deal of soreness, dizzy spells, headaches, and was very nervous. I wrote you for advice and commenced treatment with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound as you directed, and I am happy to say that all those distressing symptoms left me, and I have passed safely through the change of life a well woman."

For special advice regarding this important period women are invited to write to Mrs. Pinkham for advice. It is free and always helpful.

Why People Walk in Circles.

The well-known fact that people lost in a desert or a forest invariable walk in a circle is due to a slight inequality in the length of the legs. A series of careful measurements showed that only 10 per cent had lower limbs equal in length, 35 per cent had the right longer than the left, while in 55 per cent the left leg was the longer. The result of one limb being longer than the other will naturally be that a person will unconsciously take a longer step with the longer limb. Consequently he will trend to the right or to the left, according to whether the left or the right is the longer, unless the tendency to deviate is corrected by the eye. This inequality in the length of the limbs is not confined to any particular sex or race, but seems to be universal.

Picturesque Brigand.

Algeria is threatened with that most terrible scourge which can afflict a country-side—a brigand with prestige and a picturesque legend. His name is Gaya Chaba, and he is an Arab who deserted from a native infantry regiment to turn brigand. He is now terrorizing the Arad district, where his crimes and his impunity inspire the natives with the belief that he is invulnerable. He is already sure of food and shelter against pursuit throughout the region, and before long may be surrounded by a formidable band. The authorities are alive to the danger, and are straining every nerve to break down the legend.

Against Adorning Hats With Birds.

Prof. Theodore A. Schorr, who has just died in Baltimore, was a pioneer in the crusade against killing birds for hat adornment. He had a collection of birds and butterflies, representing 50,000 species, valued at about $100,000. He had in his possession more than 1,200 personal letters and testimonials from presidents of universities and colleges regarding his exhibit.

When her father died his daughter decided to finish the contract which he had made. She hired Italian laborers and has personally superintended the work. She cleared up all the debts he owed to the amount of $50,000.

Champion Officeholder.

E. W. Sweeley, a justice of the peace in Loyalsock, Lycoming county, Pa., claims the record for officeholding in that state. Altogether he has held various township and county offices whose terms aggregate 109 years during his life of 68 years, and he is still adding to his record. Mr. Sweeley is a democrat, and that he is popular is shown by his record, as follows: Justice of the peace, thirty-five years; assessor, twenty-six years; supervisor, eight years; school director, fifteen years; overseer of the poor, six years; township auditor, twelve years; county auditor, four years; jury commissioner, three years.

River of Ink.

Algeria possesses a true phenomenon of nature, a river of genuine ink, caused by the joining of two streams, one of which comes from an iron region, while the second flows from a peat swamp. On meeting the acid of one stream blends with the iron solution of the other, and ink is the result.

THE PULPIT.

A BRILLIANT SUNDAY SERMON BY DEAN H. MARTYN HART.

Subject: Tithing—The Social Problem.

Denver, Col.—Dean H. Martyn Hart, of the St. John's Cathedral, recently preached a sermon on "Tithing—the Divine Solution of the Social Problem." The text was from Matthew xxii:21: "Render, therefore, unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's and unto God the things which are God's." Dean Hart said:

"It surely was no just argument that because the head of Caesar was upon the coin it therefore belonged to him and ought to be returned to the imperial treasury, any more than because the effigy of the king is struck upon the English sovereign that therefore all sovereigns are his property.

"You will notice that the Lord had said, 'Show me the tribute money.' A bystander offered the coin, which lay in the extended palm of the Lord's hand. The Jews have ever been the most precocious of money dealers. Had the Romans permitted them to pay their taxes in all manner of coins, great would have been the loss to the exchequer; therefore a coin was struck, and there are still some of them to be seen, in which alone it was lawful to pay the tax. This coin had to be purchased from the publican of the district, who looked after his own interests. The 'tribute money' went to Rome, to the imperial treasury.

"The man who had produced the coin had already acknowledged his liability and had provided himself with the means of liquidating it. The coin was only of use for the one purpose; that one thing was the payment of the tribute. The questioner had answered himself. 'Fulfill your obligation,' said the Lord, 'and render unto Caesar the things that be Caesar's, and do not forget that the power of Caesar is only the representative of the higher power by whom kings reign, and if you admit the authority of the servant by so much more should you recognize the authority of the Master: render, therefore, unto God the things that are God's.' What, then, are 'the things of God' which we are required to render unto Him?

"If the context requires that the parallel shall be continued, and it is in a sum of money that the answer must be given, then the only reply can be that one-tenth of every man's income is 'a thing of God.' Now what evidence have we that this is so and what is the purpose of the law?

"The ultimate appeal as to what is truth must be the opinion of the race. If the opinion of all men could be taken as to the truth or falsity of any proposition, that would be a final determination. When anybody is in doubt of a legal or medical question, the only solution of the doubt is an appeal to men of the legal or medical professions. 'Counsel's opinion' is taken, or the sufferer goes to a doctor. If it were possible to extend this natural instinct to the limits of humanity and upon any question of grave import the opinion of all men could be ascertained, then that expression would be as nearly truth as it is possible for us men to arrive at.

"The Lincolnian canon is as sure a rule as the most firmly established axiom. 'You cannot fool all the people all the time.' There are, at least, double the number of Bibles in the world as there are all other books put together. If the list of the libraries in the world be taken out of an encyclopedia and the number of their volumes added, it will be found that in all the libraries which possess over 100,000 volumes there are 50,000,000 books, and if we allow that there are as many books in household libraries as in these great public collections, which is making a liberal estimate, we may safely conclude that there are not more than 100,000,000 secular books in the world. But during the last century the leading Bible societies of Europe and America put out more than 200,000,000 Bibles, in 360 different languages. The British and Foreign Bible Society turns out of its presses seven Bibles, or parts of the Bible, every minute, day and night. It is, therefore, the opinion of the race that this Book is 'the most valuable thing in the world,' as the Archbishop of Canterbury describes it, as he handed a copy to the new-crowned king.

"The opinion of the race is that the Bible is a book of truth; that it is what it professes to be—the revelation of the heavenly Father to the children of men. Now if this be the case, it would be strange indeed if this communication from outside our life did not instruct us as to the great desiderata of every individual. Let any one ask himself what would make him perfectly happy and content in this present state of existence.

"The reply would be: First, to have a conscience void of offense; next, to have no fear of death, but a looking forward to a glory to be revealed; and finally, to be removed from any anxiety as to the necessities of living. As we should expect, the answers to these essential requirements of life are given on the very first page of human history.

"In the dramatic story of Cain and Abel the three provisions for satisfying these three fundamental wants are plainly stated. These two brothers came together on the same day, at the same time, to the same place, for the same purpose: there were two altars and each brought material for sacrifice.

"The essential truth of sacrifice, despite the immense ingenuity which has been employed to explain it away, remains stamped upon it. Millions of intelligent men have brought an innocent victim to an altar erected to the unseen but recognized God. Putting their hands on the head of the victim, they confessed the sins which lay a burden on their conscience; they thus killed the sacrificial animal; they burnt part of it and ate the rest of it. It would be an insult to the intelligence of mankind to admit that all the generations of men should, one after another, perform sacrifice in practically the same way, and mean nothing by it. The meaning of its ritual is written large upon its surface. No sensible man could for a moment believe that the wrongs he had done, and which he regretted and would undo if he could, and was prepared to make what atonement for he was able, he could transfer to a dumb animal by putting his hands on its head and confessing his sins. That innocent animal represented some other Being, who 'could bear the sins of the world.' The only nation of theologians the world has ever produced kept dear the original revelation. They knew there was 'a Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.'

"That God requires of men a tenth of their income, as a tax for the general purposes of the commonweal, and issued this law as one of the fundamental rules for the guidance of human society, is evident from the fact of its wide observance by ancient nations. One instance must suffice. In Plutarch's life of the Dictator Camillus, it is recorded that after the taking of the Etruscan City of Veii, the augurs reported from their inspection of the sacrifices, that the gods were outraged. An inquiry was instituted and it was ascertained that the soldiers who had been concerned in the sacking of the city had neglected to dedicate the accustomed tenth to the gods. The senate decreed that the victorious legions should make restitution and that a cup of gold of eight talents weight should be sent as a trespass offering to the Temple of Apollo at Delphi.

"The Roman ladies brought, of their own free will, such liberal gifts of jewels and gold that the Senate, to honor them, decreed that funeral orations might be made at the obsequies of women, which hitherto had only been permitted over eminent public men. This extraordinary episode proves how rarely it happened that tithes were not paid and how grievous was the sin of omitting their payment. The further history of this incident also proves that the payment of tithes was a world wide institution and carried with it a sacredness which can only be accounted for by admitting that it was a primitive and universally recognized law of God.

"Three senators of high rank were appointed to carry the restored tithe, with the trespass offering, to Delphos. On its way the embassy was taken by the Liparians, who were then at war with Rome. But when the governor of the city understood that the rich booty was tithe on its way to Delphos, he not only liberated the Romans, but sent a squadron of his own fleet to convoy them safely on their way.

"This dedication at a tenth, for the common purposes of the community, could only have been devised by a mind which thoroughly understood the whole problem of the needs of human society. If it were honestly practiced it would be found just enough to alleviate all social pressure—and it is not a little to be wondered at, that the public eye should be blinded to such an exceedingly simple and easily executed law, which could readily be enacted and as readily executed. Suppose that every citizen comprehended the effectiveness of the law of tithe and voted that it should be constituted a national income tax, what would be the result?

"Consider the absolute impossibility of legislating against trusts or combinations of capital. Legislation against the natural processes of trade can never be a success. The money getting proclivity is an element in the character of men, which, like other characteristics, varies in different people. Those in whom it is largely developed will accumulate money naturally. If all the wealth of the community were evenly distributed among its individuals it would, in the course of a few years, go back again into the hands of those who possessed the aptitude of making money. The law of God would tax this capability for the benefit of those who do not possess it, and for those who by various disabilities gravitate below the line of comfortable living.

"The taxation of a tenth will be found to be that exact fraction which everybody can subscribe without distress, and exactly that sum which will maintain those who from various causes are unable to maintain themselves. All communities have about the same proportionate composition, and the example afforded by this city of Denver will be applicable to any other city mutatis mutandis.

"This city is composed of about thirty thousand houses. It will be readily conceded that for living purposes each house must represent a yearly income of $1000. So that the minimum income of this city is $30,000,000. The actual income is probably twice that amount. But see the effect of tithing this minimum $30,000,000. The tithe would be $3,000,000. Now, by actual reckoning, it is found that the income of the 125 churches, that is, all moneys gathered for all purposes from the people worshiping in them, amounts to less than $300,000. Last year the incomes of the five largest denominations were: The Presbyterians, $56,000; the Episcopalians, $48,000; the Congregationalists, $34,000; the Baptists, $31,000, and the Methodists, $21,600. So that $250,000 will represent the religious income of this community. The County Commissioners expended on relief $86,000. The four hospitals did not spend in charitable work $50,000. The other societies which exist for eleemosynary purposes, together with all the private charity of the city, will have their expenditures well covered by $114,000. So that $500,000 represents the religious and charitable cost to a city of 165,000 people, of maintaining its churches, hospitals and charitable societies. The public school system, which is remarkably efficient, cost $486,000. Thus, for all sorts of charitable relief, all sorts of religious effort and for public education the city of Denver spent $1,000,000.

If tithing were in force the tithe commissioners would have, at the least, $3,000,000 at their disposal—that means to say that the churches might all be free, the hospitals wide open and well equipped; public laundries might relieve the women of the working classes; their food might be cooked at the public kitchens; every man too old to work might be pensioned; the streets might be gardens, where all such pensioners might have easy labor, and every reasonable cause for discontent might be removed.

Let the people demand that an income tax of a tenth shall be a national levy. The English pay income tax, why should not Americans? The Mormons pay tithe, and they have no poor and no discontent, so far as the matter of living is concerned. It is the law of God, wonderful, simple and completely effective, whereby all social disabilities may be removed.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR OCTOBER 22.

Subject: Rebuilding the Temple. Ezra iii., 10 to iv., 5—Golden Text, I. Cor. iii., 17—Memory Verses, 10, 11.—Commentary on the Day's Lesson.

I. The foundation of the temple laid (vs. 10-13). 10. "The builders." Joshua and Zerubbabel as managers, with the people as workmen. The people did all they could during the winter in making preparations for building the temple, for great labor must have been required in clearing the ground for the foundation as well as in providing materials. In a little more than a year after they left Babylon, Zerubbabel and Jeshua having appointed the priests and the Levites to attend to their courses, laid the foundation. The Jeshua of verse 9 is not the high priest of verse 2, but another—a Levite mentioned in chapter 2:40. "Priests in their apparel." The elegant and beautiful official robes used by the priests in their celebrations, especially the blue and scarlet and purple robes with gold and gems of the high priests and others, described in Exodus 39. Priesthood was an ordinance peculiar to Israel. "With trumpets." For summoning assemblies and joyful announcements. "The Levites." God chose the descendants of Levi for the service of His tabernacle and temple. In the wilderness they encamped around it as guardians, and in moving conveyed it from place to place.

11. "They sang together by course." Sang alternately, or responsively; one party saying, "The Lord is good," and the other responding, "For His mercy endureth forever." "All the people shouted." "Those who had known only the misery of having no temple at all praised the Lord with shouts of joy when they saw the foundation laid, for to them this was as life from the dead." 12. "Many—ancient men—wept." To them it was the day of small things (Zech. 4:10). The new house, in comparison with the old one, was "as nothing" (Hag. 2:3). The temple would not be overlaid with gold, as Solomon's, nor surrounded with such magnificent buildings. The ark, the tables, the mercy seat were lost. No visible glory would appear in the holy place. There were no answers by Urim and Thummim. There was no fire from heaven. 13. "Could not discern." This mixture of sorrow and joy is a representation of this world; some are bathing in rivers of joy, while others are drowned in floods of tears.

II. A tempting offer (vs. 1, 2). 1. "The adversaries." These were the Samaritans and different nations with which the kings of Assyria had peopled the land of Israel when they had carried the original inhabitants away into captivity. See verse 9. Doubtless they were envious of the favor shown them by Cyrus, the king of Persia. The worst enemies Judah and Benjamin had were those that said they were Jews and were not (Rev. 3:9).

2. "Let us build with you." This people no doubt were desirous of partaking of the privileges granted to the Jews by the king of Persia. Hearing that the temple was being built they were aware that it would be a fatal blow to their superstition, and therefore they set themselves to oppose it. But as they had not power to do it openly and by force they endeavored to do it secretly and by cunning. They offered their services, that by this they might pry into their counsels, find some matter of accusation against them, and thereby retard the work while they pretended to further it. "We seek your God." The religion of the Samaritans was a mixture of idolatry, superstition and ignorance; far worse at this time than it was when our Lord Himself declared that they knew not what they worshiped. The Samaritans were neither Israelites by birth, nor yet true proslytes. "Since the days of Esar-haddon." King of Assyria and Babylon. He is the only Assyrian king who reigned at Babylon. History tells us that he took a large number of people from Palestine to dwell in Babylon, and placed a large number of Babylonians in Palestine in their place. Those Assyrian settlers intermarried with the remnant of Israelite women, and their descendants, a mongrel race, went under the name of Samaritans.

III. A positive reply (v. 3). 3. "Ye have nothing to do with us." We cannot acknowledge you as worshipers of the true God, and cannot participate with you in anything that relates to His worship. No compromise measures could be considered. Zerubbabel and his associates saw that to enter into an alliance with these semi-heathen would mean the breaking down of the Jewish institutions and a relapse into idolatry. "We—will build." Thus was a great peril averted. They saved a nation, for the time, at any rate, from the danger of having their religion corrupted and adulterated by intermixture with a form of belief and practice which was altogether of an inferior type.

IV. The work delayed (vs. 4, 5). 4. "Weakened the hands." This opposition is supposed to have begun soon after the foundation was laid. During the remainder of the reign of Cyrus, about five years, they did not openly oppose a work he had commanded, but discouraged the people and perhaps intercepted their materials for building, and by bribing counselors to oppose their application to the ministers of Cyrus for supplies or protection they greatly obstructed the design. This would be more easily done, as it is probable that Daniel died about this time (Dan. 6:25-28).

5. "Until the reign of Darius." This king began to reign B. C. 522. Permission was given to complete the building in B. C. 520.

Malfeasance in Office Charged.

Peoria, Ill.—The grand jury returned a final report with a true bill against Oliver J. Bailey, chairman of the finance committee of the Peoria school board, and holding him on the charge of malfeasance in office in "suffering and permitting one Newton C. Dougherty to misappropriate and unlawfully convert to his own use school moneys to a large amount." Mr. Bailey is one of the wealthiest men in this city.

The brass knocker is again coming into fashion, and a decorator says of it: "The electric bell is all very well in its way, but it is not in it for artistic beauty with the imported knocker. Since the era of apartment living we have repeated orders for knockers. The doorway of a pretty, artistic apartment house is just about complete when a knocker is hung on the door. Shells Not Jewelry.

Judge Dole, in the United States district court of Hawaii, has sustained a protest to a ruling of Collector Stackable as to the classification of string or Tasmanian shells, large quantities of which are imported into the Hawaiians. The importers protested, and Judge Dole has held that they are not jewelry.

COFFEE NEURALGIA

Leaves When You Quit and Use Postum.

A lady who unconsciously drifted into nervous prostration brought on by coffee, says:

"I have been a coffee drinker all my life, and used it regularly, three times a day.

"A year or two ago I became subject to nervous neuralgia, attacks of nervous headache and general nervous prostration which not only incapacitated me for doing my housework, but frequently made it necessary for me to remain in a dark room for two or three days at a time.

"I employed several good doctors, one after the other, but none of them were able to give me permanent relief.

"Eight months ago a friend suggested that perhaps coffee was the cause of my troubles and that I try Postum Food Coffee and give up the old coffee. I am glad I took her advice, for my health has been entirely restored. I have no more neuralgia, nor have had one solitary headache in all these eight months. No more of my days are wasted in solitary, confinement in a dark room. I do all my own work with ease. The flesh that I lost during the years of my nervous prostration has come back to me during these months and I am once more a happy, healthy woman. I enclose a list of names of friends who can vouch for the truth of the statement." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

Ten days' trial leaving off coffee and using Postum is sufficient. All grocers.

TALKS

DISPELLING TOBACCO ODOR.

The unpleasant smell of tobacco clinging to curtains and furniture may be dispelled by sprinkling ground coffee on a shovel, setting it alight, and carrying the latter about the room. Coffe fumes, are in all cases, admirable as disinfectants.

HOW TO CARE FOR A BRASS BED.

The bed should be dusted with a soft cloth every day, and if the brass looks soiled rub it with a cloth slightly moistened with sweet oil and then polish it with a piece of chamois leather.

SERVING SOME DISHES.

Curries, ragouts or fricassees are more ornamental if served in a border of rice or mashed potatoes. These are molded in pretty fluted forms and decorated by brushing the rims and raised points with the white of a raw egg, and then sprinkling with chopped parsely. Small baskets about the size of a teacup are made of mashed potatoes to hold creamed chicken, fish or oysters. The potato is forced in a rotary motion through a pastry bag, brushed over with egg white, and placed in a cool oven to dry. Handles are emulated by sprigs of parsley arched to meet above, and green rims are given with chopped parsley.

DRINKS FOR INVALIDS.

A delightful drink is made by pouring grapefruit juice and a little of the poup over pounded ice, and serving it in a glass cup. It takes the place of a frozen ice and is more quickly prepared. The beaten white of an egg may be added, and orange flavoring instead of the grapefruit. Grape juice, if home-made or of an assured purity, may be used in the same way, and is particularly pretty and attractive, as well as appetizing, because of the color as it blends with the crushed ice. The clear or somewhat diluted grape juice may be served as a beverage, and clear strained juice of grapefruit is always extremely refreshing and quite safe to give in cases of fever when the mouth and throat are parched and dry. All such drinks must be prepared at the moment when they are to be used, as the necessity for having them cold and the crushed ice crisp and dry is marked.—Harper's Bazaar.

RECIPES.

Corn Fritters—Select young, tender, fresh corn, take off every vestige of silk, then, with a sharp knife, cut down through each row of kernels. When this is done change for a blunt knife and press out the pulp, leaving the hull behind. To a pint of this pulp add the yolk of a well beaten egg, a cup of flour sifted with a teaspoonful of baking powder, a teaspoonful of salt, a half teaspoonful of pepper, three tablespoonfuls of milk and a tablespoonful of melted butter. Lastly, fold in the white of the egg beaten to a stiff froth. Drop this batter by the tablespoonful into a kettle of hot fat and turn as they brown from one side to the other, taking care not to pierce the fritters, and let out the steam. Serve very hot, on a hot platter. When fresh corn is not at hand the canned may be used in the same way.

Green Pepper Croquets—Select sweet peppers of uniform size, wash well and plunge in boiling water. Simmer five minutes, take from the water and rub off the skin with a wet cloth. If the peppers are round cut off the stem ends and remove the seeds. If long, cut in two lengthwise. When cold fill each half with a force meat made of a cup of fine bread crumbs, a half cup of minced boiled ham, tongue, or chicken, seasoned with a suspicion of onion juice, salt and pepper and moistened with melted butter. Lay the peppers in a baking pan, pour a cup of plain soup stock around them, cover and bake 15 minutes, then uncover and brown. Serve on a pretty platter with cream sauce poured over them.

Tomato and Lettuce Salad—This is one of the prettiest of all salads, as well as the most grateful. In the hotels, even the best, tomatoes are not peeled nowadays, but the careful housewife prefers to take a little extra time and relieve the stomach from the necessity of battling with the entirely unremunerative skin. To accomplish this task quickly wash the tomatoes with boiling water and let them stand a moment entirely immersed. Take out, put in a colander and let the cold water from the faucet run over them three or four minutes, when the skins can be slipped off without injuring the appearance or firmness of the fruit. Slice evenly with a sharp knife, lay on leaves of crispy lettuce and dress with mayonnaise or French dressing. Instead of slicing the tomatoes when small and round, can have enough of their pulp cut out to form a cup, which is filled with minced chives or celery and mayonnaise.

Rice a la Japanese—The Japs excel in cooking rice, and their method is exceedingly simply. Put one cupful of rice which has been thoroughly washed over the fire with five of fast boiling water. Add salt, and when it has boiled fast for fifteen minutes set the saucepan, uncovered, in a moderate oven. In fifteen minutes the water will have completely evaporated, and every grain be distinct and fluffy. Not a grain will stick to the saucepan.

To make Cheap Gas-light for Country Homes

TAKE a common Clay Pipe.

Put a simple "Acetylene" Gasburner on its stem.

Bind the two in position with a tight-fitting piece of Rubber Hose.

Then fill the bowl of the pipe with fine-ground Calcium Carbide.

Next tie a rag over head of the bowl to keep in the Carbide.

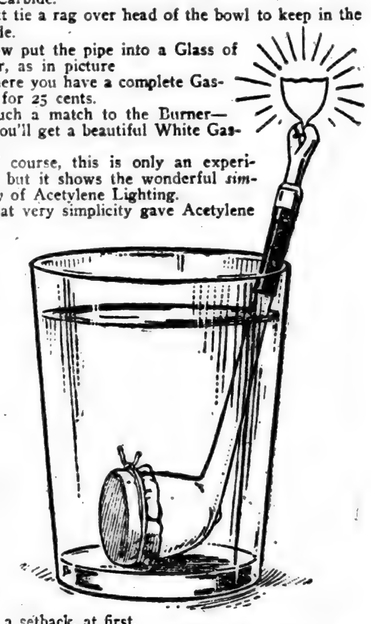
Now put the pipe into a Glass of Water, as in picture

There you have a complete Gas-plant for 25 cents.

Touch a match to the Burner—and you'll get a beautiful White Gas-light.

Of course, this is only an experiment, but it shows the wonderful simplicity of Acetylene Lighting.

That very simplicity gave Acetylene



Light a setback, at first.

It seemed so simple to turn Calcium Carbide into Gas-light that over 600 different kinds of "tanks" and "Acetylene Machines" were invented, patented, and marketed for the purpose, by about as many different people.

Well, the thing to be expected certainly happened!

About 530 of these "Acetylene Machines" had been invented and sold by people who knew more about Tinware than they did about Gas-making.

The "Calcium Carbide" was all right all the time, but 530 of the machines for turning it into Gas were all wrong all the time.

So Acetylene Gas "got a bad name," though it is clear enough now that it never deserved it at any time.

It was like selling Wood Stoves to burn Hard Coal in, and then blaming the Coal for not burning.

* * *

Lots of things happened to grieve the Owners of these 530 makes of alleged "Acetylene Machines."

But very few accidents occurred from them even in the days of rank experiment and dense ignorance, among, "Generator" Makers.

Of course, a gun will go off, unexpectedly, now and then, if the trigger be pulled by a person who "didn't know it was loaded."

But, that's no fault of the Ammunition—is it?

Well, finally the Insurance Companies got after these 530 odd makes of "Acetylene Machines" that wouldn't Acetylate, and the Insurance Board made an investigation of all Generators that were submitted to them.

Then, out of the 600 odd "Machines" patented, only about 70 were "permitted" by the Insurance Board to be used.

Oh, what a howl was there!

By "permitted" I mean that the Insurance Board was willing that any building should be Insured, without extra charge, which used any one of these 70 Acetylene Generators it had found safe, and effective, just as it permitted houses to be piped for City Gas, or wired for Electricity, under proper conditions.

Now, the Insurance Companies ought to know whether or not these 70 different makes of Acetylene Generators were absolutely Safe to use.

Because, they have to pay the bills, if Fire or Explosion occurs, from any one of the Acetylene Generators they authorize.

And, here's a proof of their good judgment.

Though there are now Two Million people using Acetylene Light in America, there have only been four Fires from it in one year, against 8865 Fires from Kerosene and Gasoline.

There have also been 4691 Fires from Electricity, 1707 Fires from City Gas, and 520 Fires from Candles.

Besides these there have been 26 Fires from the Sun's rays, But,—only four Fires from Acetylene.

That shows how careful the Insurance Board was in its examination of Acetylene Generators, and in "permitting" only the 70 makes that were above suspicion, out of the 600 experiments that were once on the market.

* * *

Well,—the boom in Acetylene Lighting made lower prices possible on the material it is derived from, viz., Calcium Carbide, a material that looks like Granite but acts like Magic.

Today, Acetylene Light is a full third cheaper than Kerosene Light, or Gasoline Light, per Candle Power.

It is not more than half the price of Electric Light, nor three-fourths that of City Gas.

If I can't prove these statements to your full satisfaction my name is not "Acetylene Jones."

But Acetylene is more than the safest and cheapest Light of the year 1905.

It is also the Whitest Light—the nearest to natural Sunlight in health-giving Blue and Violet rays, and because of this, with its freedom from flicker, it is the easiest of all Artificial Light on the Eyes.

It is so much like real Sunlight that it has made plants grow 24 hours per day in dark cellars where no ray of Sunlight could reach them. It made them grow twice as fast as similar plants that had only the Sunlight of day-time, viz., half the time.

That was proven by Cornell University in a three-months' experiment made this very year.

* * *

Now, I've saved up for the last a point more important to you than all the others about Acetylene Light.

It consumes only one-fourth as much of the vital Oxygen from the Air of Living rooms or bed-rooms, as either Kerosene or City Gas-Light consumes.

That's a tremendous difference in a lifetime, mark you—three-fourths of a difference.

Because,—Oxygen is Life.

And every bit of Oxygen stolen from the lungs of Women, Children and Men, through Lighting, is a loss that can never be made good again.

A 24 Candle-Power Acetylene Light costs you only two-fifths of a cent per hour.

That's about $5.85 per year, if burned every night in the year for four steady hours.

A Kerosene Lamp of equal capacity would cost you a third more, viz.: three-fifths of a cent per hour for Kerosene alone, or $8.75 per year.

That's exclusive of broken lamp chimneys, new wicks, and the everlasting drudgery and danger of cleaning, filling and trimming daily.

I want to prove these figures to you, Reader, if you are a house-owner or storekeeper.

Tell me how many rooms you've got and I'll tell you what it will cost to light them with brilliant, beautiful, Sanitary, eye-saving Acetylene.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Coin Named After Him.

Sir John Swinburne, who is about to be married, obtained the honor of having the threepenny bit named after him throughout South Africa. When he went to Cape Town first there was no copper coinage, and he was provident enough to take out a sackful of the smallest "collection in silver," to be used for tipping. So throughout the colony this coin is still known as "Sir John" when it is not called a "tickle."

Deceived the Nihilists.

According to a Russian political refugee now dwelling in England the course of history in Russia during the last thirty years has been largely influenced by its female spies. The famous General Trepoff at the beginning of his career was greatly aided by a clever lady member of the secret service. One day the general was fired at in the streets of St. Petersburg by a woman. The shot missed its mark, and the would-be assassin was captured and tried for the crime; but to the amazement of the public she was acquitted. On her release the Nihilists sought her out as a friend of their movement, and she was admitted to their most secret counsels. After that several of them were arrested, their plans having been mysteriously revealed to the government. The explanation is simple. The supposed attempt on the general's life was a clever ruse carried out by the lady spy, who thus won the confidence of the Nihilists.

YELLOW FEVER NEWS.

The Latest Reports From the Infected District.

New Orleans, La.—The yellow fever report in this city for the last twenty-four hours is as follows: New cases, 9; total cases, 3,214; deaths, 3; total deaths, 431; new foci, 3; cases under treatment, 143; cases discharged, 2,740.

Country Cases.

The reports from the country were very light, most of them consisting in the statement that there were no new cases. Those reporting cases were:

Hanson City, four new cases.

New Iberia, one new case, one death.

Tallulah, two new cases.

Unfavorable Day in Vicksburg.

Vicksburg, Miss.—Six new cases and two deaths was the rather unfavorable yellow fever report for the twenty-four hours ending at 6 p. m. Four of the new cases are negroes. Both the deaths were white women, Mrs. Moore and Mrs. Pierson.

Seven New Cases in Natchez.

Natchez, Miss.—Seven new cases of yellow fever were reported and six of these are white patients.

Miss Mary Chamberlain, daughter of one of the most prominent citizens of the city, and niece of Governor Chamberlain, of Oregon, is among the number. To add to the seriousness of the report three new foci were added to the list, making sixty-five foci altogether. The Chamberlain residence is in the heart of the city and across the street from St. Mary's cathedral.

David Dunn, white, aged 50, died at the hospital, making the first death from yellow fever at this institution. Summary:

New cases 7, new foci 3, total cases 174, total foci, 65, deaths 1, total deaths 8, 5 white and 3 colored; discharged 3, under treatment 31.

Mississippi Summary.

Jackson, Miss.—The Mississippi official yellow fever summary outside of Vicksburg and Natchez is as follows:

Roxie, no new cases, no deaths.

No report from any other infected districts.

Pensacola Is Encouraged.

Pensacola, Fla.—The yellow fever report showed another improvement in the situation. While there was a small increase in the number of cases, and also in the deaths, it was noticeable that the new cases were confined to the original foci named on East Hill and the western bay front sections. The summary shows that during the day fifteen new cases were reported. Two deaths occurred, fifteen were discharged. Total deaths, 55; total cases, 409.

At present there are 159 cases under treatment. This is a great improvement over the same day last week, and it is believed that the new cases will continue to diminish in number until the fever is entirely eradicated.

Although it was Sunday, the work of fumigating houses and screening did not cease.

State Health Officer Porter is encouraged over the outlook at present, and believes that the authorities will be able to stamp out the disease within a short time.

Wreck on Mobile and Ohio.

Mobile, Ala.—The fast passenger train from St. Louis to Mobile on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad ran into a local freight close to Shubuta, and both engines were wrecked. Engineer Low, of the passenger train, was badly scalded. His fireman, John Mitchell, jumped and escaped with a broken ankle. The fireman and engineer of the freight escaped with slight bruises through jumping. E. D. Rambo, of Memphis, express messenger, and Mrs. Elizabeth Peters, of Mobile, were injured on the passenger train. The line was not cleared for several hours.

No River and Harbor Bill.

Washington, D. C.—Chief of engineers of the army will not make a recommendation for harbor improvements this year to be submitted to congress save to continuing the contracts which have been authorized by law. There will be no river and harbor bill at the coming session of congress and the apportionment of the funds appropriated by the river and harbor bill last winter has been so made as to make it unnecessary to make an additional appropriation for at least a year.

Moscow Printers to Meet.

St. Petersburg.—The printers will meet here Sunday to consider the Moscow strike and discuss the situation. There is a strong strike sentiment among the men.

Malfeasance in Office Charged.

Peoria, Ill.—The grand jury returned a final report with a true bill against Oliver J. Bailey, chairman of the finance committee of the Peoria school board, and holding him on the charge of malfeasance in office in "suffering and permitting one Newton C. Dougherty to misappropriate and unlawfully convert to his own use school moneys to a large amount." Mr. Bailey is one of the wealthiest men in this city.

Had a Tough Time With Bulldog.

Anniston, Ala.—Saturday night a chicken thief, who has presumably been operating for some time in the northeastern part of the city, visited a number of chicken coops along Leighton avenue. He practically wiped out Tax Assessor Cowden's flock of feathered bipeds and then investigated the barn of D. B. Lacey, where he secured a half dozen chickens and a set of harness. Sam, Mr. Lacey's negro driver, discovered the thief and put Mr. Lacey's dogs on the fellow, who dropped his bags and made off, but was soon brought to earth by a bulldog, who seized him by the foot. Freeing himself the thief started again for safety, but was again doomed by the bulldog, who this time got hold of the other foot. In the scuffle the man lost both shoes, and, freed from these incumbrances, he made such good time that the dogs were unable to overtake him again.

Flaw in Eelection Sets Town Back.

Birmingham, Ala.—After a very exciting election, in which John D. Martin was chosen mayor and the town had taken on city airs, it has been discovered that the petition calling for a vote on the question of incorporating the town of Jonesboro, near Bessemer, did not have the requisite number of names of legal voters. Hence the election was void and the town has no legal charter, but is again a village. Mr. Martin and his board are down and out and many contemplated city improvements have been abandoned.

Torpedo Boat Damaged.

Newport, R. I.—While engaged in a torpedo flotilla practice off the Brenton's reef lightship the Blakely was in collision with the DuPont. The Blakely's bow was bent, but the damage was not serious enough to render the vessel unmanageable. The DuPont was not injured.

Killed in Wreck in Illinois.

Springfield, Ill.—The New York flyer, west-bound, on the Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern Railway, went off a derailing switch one mile west of the city limits shortly after leaving here. The passenger coaches were overturned and went into a ditch. One passenger, Mrs. John Musch, of Virginia, Ill., was killed and seventeen passengers injured.

Earl Spencer Better.

London.—The condition of Earl Spencer, the liberal leader in the house of lords, who was stricken with paralysis Thursday while at his shooting box at Foxenham, Norfolk, is slightly improved.

Thrown From Buggy and Killed.

Louisville, Ky.—While on her way to the funeral of Fred Schurch, who committed suicide Wednesday, two days after his marriage, Mrs. Charles Wittwer was thrown from a buggy in a runaway and her neck broken. She lived only a few minutes.

Rather Startling.

Chicago, Ill.—A dispatch from Pittsburg, Pa., says: "Investigation into the recent Adams Express robbery, when G. E. Cunliffe, a money clerk, disappeared with $101,000 brought to light the fact that this clerk, though handling perhaps a million dollars yearly, was paid but $55 per month in salary, and was under only $2,000 bonds."

Badly Hurt in a Gin.

Florence, Ala.—C. A. Hays met with a horrible accident while cleaning a gin at Centre Star. He was working with the brushes when his sleeve was caught in the saws, drawing his hand and forearm into the machinery. Three fingers and the thumb were cut entirely off, and amputation of his hand may be necessary.

Hold Court in Montgomery.

Atlanta, Ga.—After disposing of two cases carried up from the Georgia courts the circuit court of appeals closed its sitting in Atlanta, and Judge Don A. Pardee, D. D. Shelby and Thomas S. Maxey left for Montgomery, where they will hold court this week. From Montgomery the judges go to Fort Worth, Tex.

All Trains Now Running.

Monterey, Mexico.—All trains over the Mexican Central are now running on schedule time, and no further trouble is looked for, the majority of the striking firemen having returned to work. The rurales, however, will accompany all trains for a few days until all excitement quiets down.

Tragedy Over Craps.

Sheffield, Ala.—A shooting scrape over a game of craps on Furnace Hill nearly cost Will White his life. John Elmore did the shooting. White threatened a "get even" with Elmore and the latter got a double-barreled shotgun, and the result was that White is considered fatally wounded and the other fellow has escaped.

First Cabbage Snake Found.

Huntsville, Ala. —M. J. Blair, a well-known planter, has reported the first cabbage snakes seen in this locality this season. Mr. Blair found two snakes in a fine head of cabbage Saturday. Both of them had brown bodies and green heads. Several deaths, said to have been caused by eating poisoned cabbages, were reported last season, but these reports were never verified.

BLACK MUTINEERS KILL

Three Negroes Captured in Control of the Harry A. Berwind.

BODIES THROWN INTO THE SEA

Capt. Rummill and Four of His Crew Murdered While the Schooner Was Bound From Mobile to Philadelphia —Unable to Navigate, Men Are Captured and Put in Irons.

Southport, N. C.—News of a tragic mutiny, costing the lives of four white men and a negro aboard the four-masted schooner Harry A. Berwind, was brought here by the schooner Blanche H. King, which made port with three colored sailors in irons, the only survivors of the crew of the Berwind. Capt. Rummilll, the mate, the cook and the engineer were killed and it is thought their bodies were thrown overboard. The body of a murdered negro sailor was found on the Berwind's deck, which was splashed with blood when the craft was boarded from the King.

The mutiny grew out of the coffee served for breakfast. The sailors refused to touch the coffee, and it is said that an altercation arose between them and the cook. Several of the men were asleep, and there are indications that the mate was slaughtered in his bunk, which was stained with blood. Drops of blood were found leading from the mate's berth up to the deck, and to the side of the ship. The case is mysterious, as the survivors are terrible in their hate toward each other. The mutineers were handcuffed as soon as the boarding party had reached the deck of the Berwind. The negroes were sullen and silent, but all the signs in the ship went to show that they had wrought an awful vengeance together. It was soon developed, however, that they were fixed in implacable hatred. One of the men complained that the handcuffs were cutting his wrists. The bracelet was loosened for a moment, and quick as a flash the man whipped out a revolver and shot one of the other prisoners. The bullet inflicted an ugly wound, but one that will not be mortal.

Captain Taylor, of the King, says that he sighted the Berwind thirty miles east of the Frying Pan Lightship. The Berwind was not holding a steady course, and at one time there was danger of the schooner ramming the King. Taylor was astounded at the sight of the vessel traveling erratically, and he became suspicious that the crew might be crippled with yellow fever. He flew a signal, and the King replied with a request for boarders. At once a boat was lowered, and half a dozen men climbed up the side of the Berwind to be astounded at the bloody sight of the deck.

It was clear that a desperate conflict had been waged from stem to stern of the ship. The body of the negro was hacked with knives, and there were several deep stabs in the abdomen. Apparently the man had fought until he fell from loss of blood, and then had been slain by a stab to the heart. It is thought the captain, the cook and the engineer all died fighting desperately. The rigging was cut in several places by bullets and there were signs that the cook had been attacked in the galley. The prisoners have absolutely refused to say what was done with the bodies of the white men, and the only possible conclusion is that they were thrown into the sea. All the negroes are slightly wounded. They became greatly excited when they had been put in irons, supposedly from the relaxation of the last few days. Their guarded statements indicate that from the end of the fight on Tuesday until the boarding party came on deck the four men had watched each other unceasingly, fearing treachery. The fifth negro is supposed to have been killed only a short time before the signal was flown to the King.

A prize crew was left aboard the Berwind by Captain Taylor, and two tugs have left here to tow in the schooner. There is a fear that the Berwind may be lost, as a heavy gale is blowing, and the short-handed crew may be unable to bring her through in safety. United States Commissioner S. P. Collier and Deputy Marshal C. O. Knox have taken charge of the captives, who still are aboard the King, in quarantine.

KILLS "PEEPING TOM."

Man Who Looked in Window is Fatally Shot by Young Husband.

Fresno, Cal. — A man who played "Peeping Tom" at the window of a room occupied by a newly married couple paid for his curiosity with his life. Soon after retiring W. E. Crane and his bride saw a face at their bedroom window.

Grabbing his revolver the bridegroom rushed to the front door in time to take a shot at the man as he leaped from the porch. The man ran. Crane followed in his night clothes for a block and emptied his revolver at the fugitive.

Crane then retired only to be aroused an hour later by a policeman, who took him to jail, where he was charged with murder. The peeper turned out to be a laborer named John Kuragae. A bullet in the leg had severed an artery, and he died from loss of blood soon after reaching the hospital.

GERMANY'S MEAT FAMINE

Horse Flesh Has Risen in Price and Dog is Unobtainable.

Municipal Authorities at Their Wits' End —Using Rabbits and Sea Fish as a Last Resort.

Berlin.—The meat famine in Germany has reached a crisis.

Horseflesh has risen in price, and dogflesh is no longer obtainable.

Many municipalities have begun buying carloads of sea fish at the coast towns and selling them at cost price to their citizens. This expedient was first adopted at Solingen, but has now spread to various Westphalian cities, to Posen and even to Bavarian towns.

Reports from all parts of the country describe measures that are being taken to abate the famine. At Eisenbach a conference of the municipal authorities in that region decided to establish regular rabbit markets, and in the Munich public markets also rabbit stalls have been opened.

At a conference between the Berlin Town Council and the Burgomasters of the important cities it was voted to appeal directly to Chancellor von Buelow, and through him, to the Emperor, to remove the restrictions that close the frontiers against Russian cattle and American canned meats.

The latest Government statistics prove that the prices of meats are still rising. The September report shows that some kinds rose during the month a cent and a half a pound. The price of meat has risen nearly fifty per cent. in the past year.

SPEAKER S. F. NIXON DEAD.

End Follows Reopening of Wound—Family at Bedside.

Westfield, N. Y. — S. Fred Nixon, Speaker of the Assembly, died at his home here. He was taken ill a short time ago with what seemed to be appendicitis. Simple methods seemed to relieve the trouble, and it was thought at first that an operation would be unnecessary. Mr. Nixon seemed to be improving, when a sudden turn for the worse came. An operation was performed, and he seemed to rally from it. Since the operation his recovery has been retarded only by the unwillingness of the wound to heal. After a consultation, an anaesthetic was administered, and the wound was reopened. He did not rally from the second operation.

Gathered at the bedside were Mrs. Nixon and two of her children. One son was absent. He was at school at Cornwall-on-the-Hudson.

Samuel Frederick Nixon was born in Westfield forty-five years ago. His father, Samuel Nixon, owned a large farm outside the village and conducted a marble works.

MAYOR DUNNE BEATEN.

Aldermen Reject His Plan For Immediate Municipal Ownership.

Chicago.—Mayor Dunne's "contract plan" for immediate municipal ownership received a knock-out blow in the City Council. By a vote of 45 to 18 the Aldermen rejected the plan.

Fully thirty-four Aldermen were elected on the municipal ownership platform with the Mayor. The apparent betrayal of the people's trust is creating a whirlwind of indignation among the Mayor's followers. The Aldermen assert that they are still for municipal ownership, but not on the Dunne plan.

The "contract plan" was to lease to a company for twenty years all the city's rights in the streets, the company to be guaranteed by the city five per cent. on all moneys invested and the city to take the rest of the profits. At the end of the period the company was to turn over to the city its rolling stock and improvements for a fair compensation.

ACTOR KILLED ON STAGE.

Villain in "Michael Strogoff" Hit by Real Bullet.

Astoria, Ore.—Herbert H. Breed, an actor from Newark, N. J., was shot and killed at the Grand Opera House while taking the part of the villain in "Michael Strogoff."

The revolvers were examined as usual before the shooting act and all were found to be free of all slugs in the shells, but in this scene the villain was really shot. The audience did not at first realize that a man had been killed. When the curtain was pulled down Breed remained motionless until some one came to him and found him in the last throes of death. The man who fired the shot was Frank Laughlin, of Butte, Mont., who declared he had no suspicion that the revolver shells were loaded.

RICH MEN AS CATTLE THIEVES.

Sensation in North Dakota Over Several Recent Arrests.

Fargo, N. D.—The arrest of a banker and several supposedly honest stockmen as cattle thieves up near the Montana line has caused a great sensation. Not only are private citizens along the border of North Dakota and Montana involved, but county officials are said to have assisted the thieves through their official influence. One of the men whom it is said a full exposure will involve is a United States official, who is said to have acted as agent in selling the stock.

Music and Disease

By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel.

MUSIC not only quiets those suffering from nervous diseases but also produces nervous disorders. And many people through intense application to musical studies become neurasthenic, so that we may in a sense speak of music-neurosis. Further, it is well known that many musicians show clearly marked pathological states. Music, which should be a gentle friend and true consoler, in many instances is an active nerve irritant. At an early age the systematic injury of the child begins. The child, besides speech, must at a tender age begin to learn music. The happiest hours of the day, which should be devoted to play and movement in the open air, are passed at the piano in order that the child may learn to perform for the delectation of friends. I have no objection to a child learning music when it has a natural talent and a musical ear and when it enjoys practicing, although here also the first instruction should be merely a play in tones and not a hardship. But to instil music into a child at all costs is a barbarity which later in life may revenge itself fearfully. Further, during the developing period of life, between the ages of ten and 20 years, young people are still more sinned against. At a time when the greater part of the strength is needed for ordinary bodily development children are made to play four or five hours a day on the piano. In many cases the hands are exhausted so that the piano or violin practicing has to be given up entirely, or the children injure their health to such an extent that they can never attain the place of a great artist, because they lack the necessary harmonious completion of mental and bodily strength.

In other ways, however, music is injurious. If the musician be an adult frequently an excess of sweet sounds may be injurious. Everyone has seen in the concert halls those artists, particularly pianists, who twist and writhe before the piano, now shrinking to nothing, now leaping up, as if the body were a bubble of feeling. Everyone knows these people and doubtless many have joked about them, but these individuals are the ones who are most injured by the passion for music. Such people are perfect types of neurasthenics, and modern music is particularly fitted to increase nervous disease.

"It is," says the Florence (Ga.) Times, "much more comfortable, both to yourself and the rest of the world, to be a pleasant ass than an unpleasant bear." But why be either an ass or a bear?

The greatest aggregation of population in the history of the world will soon be gathered about the waters of New York Bay and in the country directly tributary. Already it is a population more varied in its race elements than any ever brought together in history.

Peace! It is joyous! The belligerants' interests were brought close to us because onto our soil they came to confer. We felt the pride of country in seeing it end in success. The Japanese, gauging rightly the sentiment of the nations, magnimously gave way to it. Russia, recognizing in itself a beaten, but unconquered country, gave way all that it felt the honor of the defeated could relinquish, the New York Commercial points out. Japan gains what she could not acquire in years of peaceful pursuits, in diplomatic wrangling, or in aggressive absorption of neighboring teritory. Henceforth her position is assured among the nations, and she has the good will that goes to a victor not unmindful of the quality of mercy. Russia, all-powerful, great, half-savage and a still-slumbering giant, has been taught the lesson of the ages. She may turn now from territorial-agrandizement to internal development. She may forget the prediction of Napoleon, for Europe is not yet all Cossack. She may give the ballot to her sons instead of the gun, the open book and not the haunting fear of Siberia. Both nations have fought well. They have demonstrated again that "war is hell," and merges on bankruptcy. Now should follow for them an era of peace and unexampled development, and with the happy conclusion of the terms of peace we lift our hat to that remarkable and lovable man alike of war and of peace who did it.—Theodore Roosevelt!

How to Save Niagara

By Louis L. Thunstrom.

THERE has lately been much discussion on how to save Niagara Falls. I take here the liberty to describe a method for utilising the greater part of the energy in the falls without injuring in the least the beauty of the falls and without necesaitating any engineering structures in the vicinity of the falls.

Suppose a dam, constructed across Niagara River, a few miles above the falls or at the beginning of the river. Let the gates of the dam be closed half of the time and opened half of the time, making the river flow, say for instance, twelve hours in daytime. There would be no danger of overflow, when the gates are shut, with the large area of Lake Erie above the dam. It is evident that twice the regular flow of the river could be extracted from Lake Erie in the daytime. Let the regular flow pass over the falls and take a quantity equal to half the regular flow continually for power purposes. This would give about 3,500,000 horse-power without injuring in the least the beauty of the falls. The gates of the dam could be open, say nine hours in the day and three hours in the night. In order to make it possible to see the falls also at night. It seems to me that if these arrangements were possible, it would give a great amount of power and at the same time save the destruction of the falls.

PRESIDENT'S VISIT.

He was Awarded True Southern Hospitality Tuesday in Alabama.

HE IS GREETED EVERYWHERE.

Stirring Addresses and Unbound Enthusiasm on Every Hand—A Vast Throng Here to See Him.

Birmingham, Ala.—"I tell you, it's tremendous. It's a great sight! Isn't it magnificent?"

That's what President Roosevelt said Tuesday afternoon when he stepped into the grand stand at Capitol park and looked out over the great multitude of his Alabama countrymen who had assembled in Birmingham to meet him, and to greet him with a characteristic southern welcome.

The President was right.

It was a great sight—tremendous, magnificent.

The demonstration was great when the President arrived at the union station at 4:45 o'clock. It became greater when, escorted by military and civic organizations, the presidential carriage rolled out of the station shed and wheeled into Twentieth street. It increased in magnitude and magnificence every moment as the President was driven toward Capitol park, seven blocks away, and when he arrived there and stepped bareheaded into the grand stand, the scene was one never before known in Birmingham, and seldom if ever exceeded elsewhere.

100,000 Persons There.

The eyes of 100,000 persons mirrored the figure of the chief magistrate of this country, and 100,000 persons more were making a desperate effort to get a glimpse of him. As they looked up and at President Roosevelt the soul of each man, woman and child there shone in their eyes.

The great throng cheered the President to the echo when he arrived in the city; cheered him as he passed among them; cheered him again and again as he spoke to them at Capitol park, and followed his carriage with salvos of applause as it left the city for the fair grounds.

There another ovation awaited the President—a welcome spontaneous, hearty, royally democratic. From 25,000 throats went up joyous shouts of greeting that died down only to be renewed again with fresh and increased vigor. The hour was late, but the people took no heed of time. The President of this country was among them; they knew him. They would make known to him the feelings of admiration and affection they cherished for him. This they did in tones that reverberated for two hours throughout the city and the valley.

"God Be With You."

Although it was night when the presidential party returned to the city, yet wherever he appeared the President was instantly recognized, surrounded and followed by thousands afoot or awheel, and when the president's special rolled out of the union station on its way over the Frisco to Memphis, the cheers that shook the railway shed proved that from the people of North Alabama a literal goodby—"God be with you!"

The President Arrives.

At 4:45 o'clock in the afternoon, the hour appointed for the President's arrival, the union passenger station and shed presented an attractive and lively scene. Various committee on reception, military and social organizations were lined up under the shed to greet the President. Every available foot of space nearly was filled. At 4:45 the President's train rolled slowly into the station. From the rear end of the last car stepped three men, Secretary Loeb and two secret service agents. Behind them came President Roosevelt.

The moment the President stepped out on the platform the cry, "That's the President!" went up. Every one within eyeshot looked eagerly at the group of men standing on the rear platform of the car. The President's figure was unmistakable. Dressed in black and wearing a silk hat, the President gripped the rail of the car with his left hand and looked calmly out over the assembled throng.

President Averts Accident.

The crowd began to close in behind and around the President's car. As it did so the train began to back. Instantly the President waived his hand deprecatingly at the crowd, warning it to stand back and off the tracks. The crowd, heeding the President's gesture of command, broke and gave way. The tracks were cleared and the backing train stopped.

Major F. Y. Anderson, chairman of the general reception committee, stepped upon the rear platform and greeted the President. The President returned the salutation most graciously, heartily grasping Major Anderson by the hand and saying: "You don't know how good it makes me feel to be with you. You really don't."

Greets Rough Riders.

Mayor Ward, who was to make a brief speech of welcome at the station in behalf of the city, came up just as the President was greeting four members of the Rough Riders' regiment, namely, John Hunter, of Oklahoma, the president of the Rough Riders' Association; Tart Atkins, Peter Force and Hooper Adams. At sight of his old comrades, the President was as joyful as a school boy. "Boys, this is great," said he. "By jove, I'm glad to see you. Hunter, how are you? And here's Adams and Atkins and Force. Why, my dear fellows, how are you? Say, McIlhenny! Oh, McIlhenny! Get Greenway. You and Greenway come here. Here are four boys of the regiment." And the President called Mr. McIlhenny and Mr. Greenway, two Rough Riders who are with him on the trip, to him and the seven men—one of them the President—shook hands heartily with one another in memory of Rough Rider days.

Mayor Ward's Welcome.

Mayor Ward took in the situation at a glance.

"Mr. President," said the mayor when he was introduced, "I'm down on the programme to make a speech, but the people want to see you and hear you. Let me welcome you most heartily to Birmingham. Come, here's your carriage. Let's go straight to the park."

"Good!" said the President. "That suits me to a T," and smiling the President got into his carriage. With him rode Secretary Loeb, Mayor Ward and General Rufus N. Rhodes.

Triumphal Procession.

The ride to Capitol park was a triumphal procession. Twentieth street was jammed. Not only the sidewalks, but the thoroughfares were filled with people. At the head of the procession came the mounted police, led by Chief Weir and Captain Johnson, breaking up the crowd and making a way for the procession. Often they had to use force to make an opening in the crowd. Next in line marched Troop D, with the Ensley detachment, and following the troop came the Howard college military cadets and the Marion Military institute cadets. The President's special guard of honor consisted of Confederate and Union veterans.

Twentieth street was brilliantly illuminated and decorated. From the windows of all the buildings looked out joyous faces. The President was kept bowing and waving his hand to right and left by the rapturous applause and cheering of the people. So dense was the crowd that it took thirty minutes for the president's carriage to go from Morris avenue up Twentieth street to Capitol park, a distance of seven blocks.

A Daughter of the Confederacy.

"The lady on horseback" to whom the President was so gracious is Miss Samuel Perry Harris, of No. 705 South Twentieth street, the sponsor of Troop D in the parade. She is named for an uncle of hers, Samuel Perry, a confederate soldier, who lost his life battling under the Stars and Bars.

After the addresses at Capitol park the party

Leaves for Fair Grounds.

At 6:15 the presidential party left Capitol park for the fair grounds, arriving there at 6:35.

More than 25,000 people heard the President speak at the fair grounds. The grand stand was filled to overflowing, and every one that could be was packed in the space between the grand stand and the race track. The aisles of the stand, the general admission seats, the reserved seats and the boxes were filled. The crowd had become restless long before the chief executive arrived, and several false reports as to his arrival were circulated.

When he arrived it was unexpectedly to the large majority present. The President was in the stand bowing and speaking on all sides before many realized that it was Mr. Roosevelt.

The cheering was long and loud as soon as the crowd realized that the President had arrived, and it was almost impossible to stop the noise long enough for President T. H. Molton, of the Commercial Club, to introduce the President.

At Fair Grounds.

Just as the President stepped into the grand stand several young women who were standing on chairs just in front of the band stand cheered him. He stepped to the side of the stand and smiled to them and bowed. He then sat among the members of the reception committee and spoke in low tones to several persons near him. As soon as quiet could be obtained President Molton stepped to the front of the stand and introduced the President, and delivered his soul-stirring address.

The party left at 7:15 for Little Rock.

THE ROAD.

This common road, with hedges high
Confined on either hand,
Will surely enter by and by
Some large luxuriant land.

And in the end shall great repose
Descend upon my soul,
When, at the eager journey's close,
I reach the sudden goal.

Content, enlargement, fragrance, ease,
Joy in the evening's cool,
The subtle silence in the trees,
The gleam upon the pool—

Dreamer! In vain thou hastenest;
That glorious land resign
Take by the road thy joy, thy rest;
The road, the road is thine.

A Cousin's Treachery.

"Tired of life?" said my cousin, Jasper Meadows, as we sat in my wretched garret in the heart of the metropolis. "Perhaps my lines may be cast in more pleasant places than yours; I may have been more lucky, or—or something; but you never know when you come to the end of your tether. Never court death like that. Never say that you are tired of life."

"But I am," I replied, bitterly, raising to my lips the glass of spirits which had been my insidious companion of late. "I have lost all that makes human existence dear to man: the love of woman, friends, money—that the root and cause of all. I have tried everything and failed. Heaven knows, it is difficult enough for skilled artisans to get work in these hard times. I am among them, yet not of them. They look askance at me; they do not understand me—the penniless, starving gentleman. I am an anomaly, an outcast—perhaps partly by my own fault, I grant you—but I have been ready to go down on my knees for the hardest, the most degrading labor, so long as it be honest, in order to keep a roof over my head and put into my mouth a crust of bread, just to keep body and soul together. Even now"—I know there was a ring of envy in my tones which I could not suppress—"even now I hear that our uncle, dying, has left you rich, but has not remembered me. So can you wonder when I tell you that this winter finds me without a hope—that I am tired of my life?"

"And would fain end it?"

"And would fain end it!"

"Ah, I would not say a thing like that, if I were you. One never knows how soon one may come to repent it," he replied, with a strange smile, although I do not think I noticed it at the time.

What with misery, want and strong drink upon my empty stomach, I fear that I was not in a condition to remark anything very distinctly.

It was my cousin who had brought whisky up for me. He was one of that curious form of modern Samaritan whose charity always takes the shape of alcoholic beverages, yet who turn a deaf ear to a modest appeal to their benevolent feelings.

Well, no, I did not specially believe in Jasper Meadows; but here, alone as I dwelt—the most miserable of all solitudes, that spent in the midst of a vast multitude—it was seldom I met anyone to whom I could unbosom my grief.

Here poverty was the common lot. No one believed me. Did I not pretend to be a gentleman? How could I be poor?

There was silence between us for a few moments; then Jasper suddenly started up and exclaimed:

"Well, Dick, old man! I must be going. I am very sorry that I cannot give you any pecuniary aid just now but I have some good news for you. I thought I would keep it as a surprise till the last. Uncle Joe has remembered you, after all. Look here! This is a sworn copy of his will. He leaves you most of his money—forty thousand dollars. It would only come to me in case of your death without issue—that death which you have been so earnestly wishing for!"

I staggered to my feet, and I made a grab at the paper which he held aloft. This was surely too good to be true. "Show it to me!" I cried, and my own voice sounded to me strange and hollow.

He took a few steps backward, and slipped out of the room, closing the door after him. I rushed to call him back, but my tongue clove to my palate, my feet seemed weighted down as by lead. That cursed drink! How quickly it had taken effect upon me! I reeled and fell heavily to the floor and knew no more.

* * * * * * *

At last I came to myself, and the first impression I experienced was of a fearful weight oppressing my chest.

What was there? Nothing. Oh, it must be that cursed whiskey!

But stay! I remembered falling. I remembered all that distinctly now—falling on the floor, and now I was in bed undressed. Who had put me there? Jasper? But he had gone before I fell!

Meantime I was choaking. Strange figures were dancing before my eyes. What was the matter?

Ah! the cause was not far to seek. No food, and then too much drink; supposedly to drown my sorrows, but really to multiply them ten thousandfold, for I will freely confess that this curse lay at the bottom of at least one-half my misfortunes.

Yet what was this strange smell, this red light which pervaded the room? Was the house on fire? If so, no one knew of it, for all was quiet.

I raised myself up painfully, and perceived only a foot or two from my bed a little stove which spread its warm glow around the room. Was this a piece of eccentric kindness on the part of my cousin, who knew I was short of fuel as well as of all other necessaries?

But my brain was going round and round in a wild whirl, my breath was becoming more labored, I was choaking—Great Heaven! it was a charcoal stove!

As this thought flashed upon my mind, my head sank back upon the pillow like a lump of lead, and my glance happening to light upon the mantel, which was close to my bed—for the room was so small that it had been necessary to close the fireplace—I perceived that a candle was lighted, as though to draw attention to a scrap of paper which was pinned on the wall, having the following words written in a fair imitation of my own handwriting:

"May heaven forgive me for what I have done this night! But I have lost all that makes human existence dear to man; the love of woman, friends, money—that the root and cause of all. I have tried everything and failed; so this winter finds me without a single hope, and I am tired of my life.

RICHARD WENTWORTH.

In that single instant I remembered Jasper Meadows' parting words, and the whole truth flashed upon me.

He told me that my uncle had left me forty thousand dollars, and I stood between him—Jasper—and the money. I understood it all. He must have resolved to murder me!

He had drugged the whiskey, and, using my own words with malignant and diabolical sarcasm, had, at the same time, averted all suspicion from himself.

How clearly did the meaning of the words come back to me, and how bitterly did I repent my own impious thoughts. I was not tired of life. I had money now, which was the god and slave of the world, the key to all happiness, for with its possession we can delude ourselves into the fond belief that we have true loves and honest friends. But I would have given up all that at this moment for a single breath of fresh air.

And this was the very death which I had thought of, dreamed of, wished for, coveted. I had fancied, in my desperate, impious folly, how sweet and restful it must feel for one like me, who was so cold, both in body and mind, who had known so little of the genial light of the world's sympathy, to lie here in this insidious warmth, and recalling one by one each scene of early days, gently to pass away and solve the mighty problem of eternity.

But I did not know then what it was to choke, to gasp for every breath, to die a slow, horrible and lingering death.

Die? No, no, I would not die! I could not die! Great Heaven! I was not tired of life! But I was not dead yet. It was easy enough to free myself from this horrible situation, after all.

Only to rise and then open the door or the window.

It was, however, easier said than done. I jumped up, but something held me back. I looked and saw to my utter dismay, that my left hand had been firmly fastened to the bedstead!

Oh, the fearful, vain efforts I made to get free! I called loudly for help, but no one heard me; and, in the meantime, the oppression was growing heavier upon my chest. My tongue seemed too large for my mouth. I could feel my eyes starting from their sockets. I was dying a horrible, lingering death, and all I prayed for now was a little air.

At last, one tremendous wrench, a supreme effort, which nearly broke my wrist and dragged the bed halfway across the room; but I had burst the cords which bound me, and was free!

I staggered to the door, but might as well not have wasted the precious moments used in going there. It had been locked on the outside; the key was gone, and the keyhole stopped up.

Now, quick to turn to the window—my only remaining chance of life—while I had strength left, and there was yet time.

I grasped at the casement, but it would not move. A nail had been driven through it, fastening the lower to the upper sash!

The horror of this discovery, the fiendish precision of the meditated crime, seemed utterly too crush me, and I sank helpless and hopeless to the floor.

The insidious fumes of the charcoal were gaining rapidly upon my senses, and my thoughts passed wildly from one subject to another, as though I had been in a horrible nightmare.

What was the use of gold after all? Had not the first possession of these few miserable thousands only made for me a mortal enemy? All that mattered was the breadth of life. At that moment I would have given all the world for a mouthful of heaven's pure air—the inalienable birthright of every created thing.

Oh, Heaven! how I repented my words, now. I was not tired of life. I would not die. My brain seemed to be seething, bursting; but, with one more despairing effort, I scrambled to my feet, striking out with both hands at the dust-begrimed panes, which fell with a crash into the street below.

Oh, that puff of wind! I shall never forget it. It was only the dense atmosphere of the overcrowded neighborhood, but to me then it seemed the sweetest air that had ever fanned my cheek, and on its wings was borne the distant sound of church bells, for it was Christmas morning. But the sudden reaction was too much for me, and once more I sank down insensible upon the ground.

The sound of the breaking window attracted some neighbors, and I was saved.

I was charged with attempting to take my own life. I let them think that the truth. Why not? I might have done so. But they heard of my suddenly acquired wealth, which was to put an end to all miseries, and so I was set free.

At first I almost dreaded to touch that money, the first possession of which had been so unlucky to me; but I have been happy enough, as this world goes, since then. Jasper Meadows disappeared, went far away, and I saw nor heard no more of him. I brought no accusation against him. He had designed a fiendish crime; surely it must bring its own punishment to his conscience. But, for my part, I felt that he had taught me a lesson of infinite wisdom when he had warned me not to say or think that I was tired of my life.—New York Weekly.

MEN FEAR ELEPHANTS.

Circus Employes Call Them the Most Treacherous of All Animals.

"Perhaps the most dangerous, constantly dangerous, business in the world is the one into which I have been tossed—the business of elephant man, with a circus," said a menagerie employe.

"There is a constant demand for 'bull men,' but few will accept the position, and most of us fell into the business by accident, and, showing talent or reckless disregard for consequences, made a success in handling the animals, and have since been classed as 'bull men,' and offered that job and no other.

"Despite the perils, the constant watchfulness, the half-conscious realization that death is near probably not an elephant man in the world today would leave his calling. It has a fascination of a strange kind, and the keeper becomes attached to the great brutes that tremble at his word one instant, and the next may turn upon him and trample him.

"Good elephant men command good pay.

"Most of them live in a state of constant watchfulness, realizing the treacherous nature of the brutes and those who do not realize this sooner or later are trampled or hurled to death.

"The elephant is the most treacherous, moody, changeable animal in a menagerie. They are twice as dangerous as tigers, lions or bears. The men who handle the big cats in their cages are forced to watch closely and carefully while they are in the cages with them, but that lasts only a short time.

"We 'bull men' live with our gigantic pets, sleep near them, ride them, order them around, enter with them into closed cars for long rides. We are not afraid of them. Before many years we became fatalists. We expect them to kill us some day, but hope it may not be soon, just as the ordinary citizen expects death some day.

"Trainers testify that the elephant brain works nearer like that of a human being than the brain of any other animal. The moods and tempers of the big brutes change suddenly. The weather, a hard night's ride on the cars, a bruised foot may turn the best natured elephant into a peevish brute, ready to strike and murder in an instant. But these moods pass quickly. The great danger is when an elephant is just turning into a rogue. Every elephant turns rogue sooner or later, and they never recover. They may be tractable for a time after quieting down, but the attack will return and then probably a keeper will be killed. The female elephants turn rogues earlier and are more violent than the males, and the females are more dangerous in ordinary times.

"Elephants form great attachments for certain men and bitter hatreds for others, a hatred that means murder when the opportunity arrives. But the love of an elephant for its keeper will not deter it from killing him when the outbreak comes.

"There was one notorious elephant who traveled with a score of circuses under different names, and was finally executed, who loved one man, a friend of mine, as never maiden loved him. She would do anything for him. He drank. She cared for him and drove away every one who tried to come near when he was drunk and asleep under her feet. He was discharged from several circuses, and each time took the elephant. No one else being able to handle her, the owners of the shows understood that to dischare him was to lose the beast, and tacitly she became his property. But she in one rampage trampled him until he is a cripple for life, and she killed one of the rescuers, defending fiercely the man she had crushed.

"Good elephant men, ones who can retain the animals, command big salaries. One whom I know receives $250 a week, but the ordinary 'bull man,' recruited from among the canvas hands or laborers who have no fear, receive small salaries and accept the positions because the work is easier, being willing to risk their lives to escape hard work. These men, of course, are under competent trainers."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

RUSSIA'S CONVERTS IN JAPAN.

A Queer State of Things Disclosed by the Shipments of Vestments and Candles.

Candles, vestments and church supplies are not contraband of war these days, and steamers from San Francisco have been carrying these articles of worship and ritual on their way from Russia right into the heart of Japan, says the San Francisco Chronicle. All this because the Russian church still has hundreds of thousands of members among the Japanese, and even in the navy and army many of the highest officers were educated in the Russian church and still obey its religious commands.

This remarkable state of affairs has become known through constant shipments from San Francisco by Russian order to Yokohama, Tokio and Hakodate of the various articles used in the ceremonies of the Orthodox Greek Church. These shipments, among them one which will leave on the steamer Mongolia next week, are paid for by Russian coin from the state's coffers, and they will be used for the spiritual benefit of Russia's enemies.

A member of the consistory of the Greek Church, which for twenty years has had its American seat in San Francisco, explained this odd interchange between warring countries by the statement that for 400 years the Russian church has had its missionaries in Japan, and for 100 years has had a big university in Hakodate, where the flower of Japanese youth have been educated.

"Among the naval and army officers in the present conflict," this prelate explained, "there have been and are now many raised in our faith and trained by us to Western ideals. We have large congregations there, and naturally their religious head being still in Russia, it is from there that the supplies will come, paid for out of the Russian treasure chest. There are steady shipments from this port of candles, vestments and articles of every sort to various Japanese ports for the use of the clergy and converts there. The war has not interfered in any way with this. It is odd, of course, that two countries at war should be so related that a large number of Japanese acknowledge the supremacy of the patriarch and the Czar in religious matters, but so the fact is."

Our Misnamed Quail.

America's typical game bird, the quail, is not named correctly at all, according to the Government ornithologist. He says that the real quail is the quail of the Bible and that this is a bird belonging exclusively to the Old World. The true quail dos not occur in America at all. In many parts of this country the American bird is known as partridge, but the American partridge is really the ruffled grouse, and the true partridge again is another Old World bird and not American. He thinks that the name given to it in many localities, 'bobwhite,' is as good as any. The name comes from the cry of the bird, which is something like "bobwhite, bobwhite, bobwhite."

Washington's Watch.

Washington White, a famous negro of Boston, was once observed sitting in a street car rocking to and fro. A friend inquired if he were ill, and, receiving a negative reply, said: "Then why are you waving back and forth like that?" Washington White made no pause in his regular oscillations, as he said: "Calhoun, you know Jerome McWade? Well, he sold me a silver watch for three dollars, and if I stop a-moving' like this the watch don't go no mo'."—Argonaut.

WHEN I GROW UP.

Our grocer's clerk comes every day,
Though why he should I cannot say,
For mother mostly orders beans,
And soap and mustard, salt and greens,
And tea and starch, and lard and rice—
Not much of anything that's nice.

Such food for some folks may seem best,
But scarce excites my interest.
When I grow up, my grocer's clerk
Will very seldom need to work;
The butcher's boy I'll ask to call
Just once in spring and once in fall.

I'll have the candy boy call twice
Each day, and sometimes even thrice!
Mornings it will be best, I judge,
To order caramels and fudge;
At night, a box of chocolate creams,
To make me sure of pleasant dreams!

I mean to have the toy-shop man
Stop just as often as he can.
New toys grow tiresome soon, you know;
And then, one's friends do break them so!
Heigh-ho! what bliss will fill my cup
When I grow up! When I grow up!

IN AN APPLE.

In the core of an apple dwelt Cora, with her brother and her sister, Willie Worm and Winnie Worm. Their mamma was a Butterfly lady, who had flown away.

It was a very nice, juicy house, and the worms found it very convenient to eat their home and live in it at the same time. Cora stayed in the core because she knew that was best, but Willie Worm would eat all over the house—I should say apple—and Winnie Worm wanted to do just what Willie did.

Willie wouldn't stay in the core,
He was bound to get "out-of-door,"
He made tunnels by the score,
And every day ate more and more.

He made so many back stairs and caves and dark passages and cellars that poor little Winnie would sometimes get lost, and Cora would have to bring her back to the core.

One day Willie Worm ate right through the outside wall and saw the world.

"O Winnie," he cried,
"I'm going outside!"
"O Willie, don't go,
"You'll fall, you know!"

But Willie was wilful. He crawled out of the hole he had made, and stretched himself on the red, shining outside world. "It's fine out here," he said; "you ought to come. Just watch me. I'll show you what I can do!"

Little Winnie Worm put her head out of the hole just in time to see Willie fall on the slippery surface, slide, turn swiftly in the air, and—disappear! She was so frightened she could hardly crawl back to the core and tell Cora.

Cora was very sorry, and wept—real worm tears—but she said: "It's safer to stick to the core, and I told Willie so. If he had only waited for the thump! We must!" They did. It came!

The apple house was now on the ground, and Cora and Winnie left the core and visited the outside world. It seemed very chilly, so they made their winter beds, rolled themselves tight in many blankets, and went to sleep. They slept all winter, and never heard the cold winds blow or felt the snow. In the long sleep they even forgot little Willie Worm.

When the warm days came in spring, they opened their beds, and flew out! Such a wonderful sleep it had been! They did not feel like the same children. Even their names had been changed!

They were now Misses Coraline and Winsome Butterfly!—Joshua F. Crowell, in Youth's Companion.

A KITE THAT FLIES WELL.

Here is a small kite which may be easily made and flown from a window. The material is found in every house, and it doesn't take much effort to make one.

Get two long straws from the broom, a piece of thin, unwrinkled paper, and some thread—No. 50 or 60. The best paper is the white wrapping paper used in grocery stores. On the paper draw a line twelve inches long. Four inches from the end draw another line across it, which may be seven inches long. Connect the ends of these lines, and you will have a paper marked out to look like that in the picture. Cut off all the paper not needed. On the two lines first drawn cut little holes about two inches apart, and through them stick the broom straws. The tail is made of the same kind of paper, torn as shown, and should be about five feet long. The ends of the cross straws should now be tied together, fastening them about two inches apart. Tie a thread to this string, and the kite is ready to fly.

Find the farmer, who is accompanied by his daughter.—Mirror and Farmer.

King of the Penguins.

The "emperor" penguin, one of the discoveries of Capt. Scott's recent antarctic expedition, was the subject of an interesting illustrated lecture by Dr. Wilson, before the recent ornithological congress in London. The bird stands about four feet high, weighs about eighty pounds or more, and with its black coat and erect posture has, when seen at a distance, a truly startling resemblance to a dwarf man. These "emperors" of the penguin world live upon the great girdle of pack ice which surrounds the antarctic continent, and seem to depend daily for their food on crustaceans caught in the crevices of the ice. The female lays a solitary egg which is caught on the great web feet, so that it never touches the ice, and is held there covered with the mother's body [illegible] hatching occurs.

Ducks Afraid in the Dark.

The farmer was making his customary evening trip to the poultry yard with his lantern. "I can never understand why you do that," said the summer boarder. "Will you please tell me why you leave the lantern burning there all night? I should think it would disturb the slumbers of the hens?"

"Well, if I didn't leave it there you wouldn't get a mite of sleep all night," replied the farmer. "You see, the lantern is for the ducks. They are the most timid creatures on earth. The minute it gets dark they begin to get frightened and then they set up an infernal noise. All night long they'd keep it up if it wasn't for the lantern. That seems to give them comfort and courage, and even they're disturbed by an unusual noise. Talk about a watch dog—it isn't in it with a duck for arousing the family."—New York Press.

Get two long straws from the broom, a piece of thin, unwrinkled paper, and some thread—No. 36 or 40. The best paper is the white wrapping paper used in grocery stores. On this paper draw a line twelve inches long. Four inches from the end draw another line across it, which may be seven inches long. Connect the ends of these lines, and you will have paper marked out to look like the kite in the picture. Cut off all the paper not needed. On the two lines first drawn cut little holes about two inches apart, and through them stick the broom straws. The tail is made of the same kind of paper, torn as shown, and should be about five feet long. The ends of the cross straws should now be tied together, fastening the about two inches apart. Tie a thread to this string, and the kite is ready to fly.

Ducks Afraid in the Dark.

The farmer was making his customary evening trip to the poultry yard with his lantern. "I can never understand why you do that," said the summer boarder. "Will you please tell me why you leave the lantern burning there all night? I should think it would disturb the slumbers of the hens?"

"Well, if I didn't leave it there you wouldn't get a mite of sleep all night," replied the farmer. "You see, the lantern is for the ducks. They are the most timid creatures on earth. The minute it gets dark they begin to get frightened and then they set up an infernal noise. All night long they'd keep it up if it wasn't for the lantern. That seems to give them comfort and courage, and even they're disturbed by an unusual noise. Talk about your watch dog—it isn't in it with a duck for arousing the family."—New York Press.

The World of Trouble

Sich a world o' trouble—
Sighin' drowns the song;
Never yit felt happy,
But a cyclone comes along!

Satan sure would git me

AT PARTING

BY CATHARINE CRANMER

(Copyright, 1905, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

"When you are a man really worth while in other ways, I don't see why you persist in this impossible folly!"

"I persist, because it means everything to me, and I shall persist always, Jane, unless you marry another man."

"Now, don't say that, Wilton, for though I like men and get on admirably with them as friends, I never expect to love or marry any man!"

"It is impossible to believe that you will never love; such a woman is sure to love and love deeply. Such a life is crowded out only by love."

"But, Wilton, my life is full of other things; I have no place for love or marriage."

"Not now, perhaps, because your globe-trotting and your art studies have crowded it out for a time; but some time it will burst forth into every fibre of your being, and, Oh, Jane, if I might have the joy of calling it forth!"

"Really, Wilton, try to be practical for this, as you are in other matters. With my wandering foot and my distaste for home life what kind of a wife would I make? Go to some sweet and loving girl, lavish this beautiful love on her and let her make you happy."

"You ought to know how useless such advice like that. It is not that I simply want to marry. I want to marry you."

"If I felt worthy of such love I'd be less unhappy to hear you talk so; but here I am, lacking in the qualities which are the very essentials to married happiness."

"Not lacking; simply crowded out temporarily. Since I have known you I have asked you three times to marry me, and you never gave me this reason before. The first time you were too young, you said, you would answer me two years later; two years later you were afraid to trust yourself to live on a salary, and your trip to the Orient could not be put aside. The third time your mother's health took you to Switzerland with her for an indefinite time. Now, that all these things are out of the way, your career steps in."

"There was another reason in each case, Wilton. I did not love you well enough. Our friendship has meant so much to me; in fact, I have few if any friends with whom I have so much in common; yet have I ever sought to encourage anything more than friendship on your part?"

"You certainly have not; but the master passion of a man's life does not have to be nurtured and encouraged into growth; it grows in spite of everything."

"You sail for Europe, when?" asked Wilton.

"The 15th."

"And will remain how long?"

"One year."

"And then?"

"Magazine illustrating."

"Then what?"

"Why, success, I hope, what more could I ask?"

"You may not ask more; but far more than professional success will never expect to love or marry any man."

be necessary to make you content."

This attempt to undermine her professional air castle rather nettled Jane, and when the man had claimed his dance came, she gave him the sweetest of smiles, while to poor Wilton she gave only a cool nod as she walked away. He stood and watched her as one watches the fading of a beautiful sunset, when all its gorgeous colors die into a somber gray. When she passed from his sight it seemed to him that all the color of his hopes had turned to this same gray. He left without again entering the ball room.

The next morning as Jane was at breakfast, she received a box of exquisite sunrise roses, and a brief note, which said:

"Jane: You leave Chicago to-day. I cannot trust myself to say good-bye. May your life be as full of color as these roses, but if the color ever fades and you have need of a friend, remember that I shall be faithful always. WILTON."

Jane looked first at these lovely roses, and then at some American Beauties, sent by another man. She pushed the latter from her.

"Bah! You are like a common person, suddenly grown rich," and burying her face among the ones that Wilton sent, she added, "but you are genuine aristocracy."

"The widow Oagle."

Something like a dewdrop could be seen among these roses, and a match for it was in either of Jane's eyes. She had not thought that their parting on the veranda was to be their last for a year. She had been almost uncivil to Wilton, who was after all her best friend. Seized by an impulse she did not stop to define, she selected one of the most beautiful roses, and enclosed it in a box with her card, on the back of which she wrote:

"This rose brings my parting message. Thank you many times, dear friend——and good-bye. JANE."

By the time it reached Wilton Jane was aboard the Twentieth Century Limited, well on her way to New York.

Though Wilton had seldom written, he had kept her supplied with the latest American books, and the home newspapers. Of late, however, she had year was nearly over she met some received fewer of these. When her Chicago friends, who poured out all the home news and gossip.

"And, Oh, Jane," one of the girls said, "your old stand-by, Wilton Ellis, has joined the Widow Oagle's train, and they do say she means to rope him in."

Jane was conscious of being closely watched by all of the party when this was said, but no sign of such consciousness was visible as she asked, rather indifferently:

"Who is this Widow Oagle, I don't think she was there when I left?"

"Oh, no, she came in the winter. Half the men in town have been devoted to her. Her husband was an army officer, killed in the Philippines, which, Jack Gwinn says, is proof to him that there is luck in store for all men, even though it be late in coming."

When Jane sat down at her desk that evening, she did not seem to be interested in the illustration she had begun. She pushed it aside and drew a picture of a beautiful woman, surrounded by admirers, while Cupid dragged away a trunk, labeled "Widow's Weeds."

Two months later, when she arrived in Chicago, almost the first person she saw was Mrs. Dan Shelley, who said:

"Oh, you wandering Gypsy, how good to see you again! And I'm giving a dinner to-morrow evening. You can't say no; I won't listen. And wear your fetchiest Paris gown, for there is nothing new in this old town."

When Jane entered Mrs. Dan's drawing room there was a perceptible murmur of admiration. Around her bare white throat were beautiful strings of amber beads—her only ornaments. In harmony with all these autumn tints, Jane's changeful hazel eyes looked out from under their crown of copper colored hair.

Nearly all the guests were her old acquaintances, but among the strangers, the first she met was Mrs. Oagle, who had Wilton in tow.

It seemed of late that Mrs. Oagle's songs were a part of every function. When the guests were about to leave, some one said:

"You leave us to-morrow for the east, Mrs. Oagle; you won't refuse us one song?"

Gracefully rising, she went to the piano.

"Just a little parting message," she said, sweetly.

Somehow this recalled another parting message to Jane and Wilton. Their eyes met and were held together as the rich voice sang:

"The sweetest flower that blows,
I give thee, as we part;
To you it is a rose,
To me it is my heart."

Jane loked away, but looking up again, Wilton's eyes were still on her's as the voice ended in a burst of passion:

"You think it but a rose,
Ah, me! It is my heart."

Something in Jane's look brought Wilton to her side, instead of to Mrs. Oagle's, where he was evidently expected, and the petals of the deep red rose which had been meant for him, were gracefully scattered among the guests as the widow departed.

Next morning Jane received another box of exquisite Sunrise roses.

Co-operation of English Farmers.

The Agricultural Organization society was formed four years ago to promote reciprocal aid among British farmers, and statements at the annual meeting recently held show that its object is being successfully carried out. The number of branch societies has largely increased and is now 113, embracing 33 counties, while the membership has advanced from 4,500 in 1904 to 6,500 now. One of the important aims of the society is the cheapening of freight rates, which have been excessively burdensome in England to the small shipper. This is being done with success by combining farm products in wholesale quantities. General working expenses have been reduced and in some cases the prices of products have been increased through the harmonious working of the society. It also enables members to buy in wholesale quantities from one central point instead of dribbling out small orders to a large number of producers. Farmers can buy their supplies and implements at wholesale prices, and this is considered so important that prophets are found who see in it the redemption of British agriculture from the low estate to which it has declined.

Death's Lullaby.

Lullaby, lullaby, lullaby life
Hush thee to sleep, to sleep.
Why should you long for the struggle and strife,
Stay here and mourn and weep,
When you may sink in my arms and find rest,
Pillow your head on the earth's gentle breast
Lullaby, lullaby, lullaby life,

Lullaby, lullaby, lullaby life,
Close your weariful eyes.
Why should you linger in care and in strife
Under these sorrowful skies
Come to my arms and win quiet and peace,
Let all your troubles and fretfulness cease,
Lullaby, lullaby, lullaby life.

Lullaby, lullaby, lullaby life,
Briefly yon spangled sun gleams,
Why should you love all this fanciful strife
Chasing the phantom of dreams?
Flee from the quest of but vanishing mirth,
Come and lie down in the arms of the earth,
Lullaby, lullaby, lullaby life.

Is a British Princess.

The crown princess of Roumania, who is now staying with her children in the Isle of Wight, is a British princess, being the eldest daughter of the late duke of Saxe-Coburg—the duke of Edinburgh of olden days. The crown princess is a beautiful and accomplished woman, and one of the most attractive of King Edward's many nieces. She is very musical, and, like her late father, a finished violinist. She dresses perfectly, and has many artistic tastes. In girlhood she was known in her home by the pet name of "Missy," a name which even now is not forgotten.

BARROOMS IN THE BIG HOTELS

Are Being Driven From the Field by the Boudoir Buffet.

The magnificent hotel barrooms, which were a feature of Broadway life a decade ago, are being driven from the field by the boudoir buffet. Old-time hotels like the St. Nicholas, the New York, the Metropolitan, the Morton house, Union Square, Coleman and others that made New York barrooms something to talk about a few years ago almost have gone out of existence. Barkeepers and mixers of special drinks that made them famous either have gone to another sphere or into other business, and there are none to take their places. To cite the most conspicuous example the famous elliptical bar in the Hoffman house, which Edward S. Stokes made the talk of two continents, has been taken away. The collection of expensive paintings, so famous that a special view hour each morning was appointed for women, has been dispersed. What was once the most magnificent barroom in the world in now a very commonplace cafe in comparison with the more modern New York hotels. There is a small barroom in another part of the hotel which bears about the same relation to the sumptuous Stokes menage as a pushcart does to a pony carriage. This is true of all the big hotels. The waiter and small table have put the barkeeper out of business. In many of the new boudoir bars if a customer steps up to the small bar and orders a drink he is asked to take a seat at one of the tables and a waiter will carry the drink to him. This usually involves a tip to the waiter that approximates one-half the price of the drink. The old-time barkeeper complains bitterly at the innovation of the foreign waiter in the barroom or cafe.

Obedience a Help.

There is a woman down in Indiana who is hale and hearty at the age of 100, and when she was asked to what she attributed her age and health she replied, "Obedience." And this, too, at a time when the women are having the word "obey" taken out of the marriage service and in other ways manifesting the most supreme contempt for the old obligation. It is not to be believed that there are many women who will care to drag out an existence of 100 years in a state of obedience, even if a fair degree of health is assured. The holy scriptures do not tell us how long the women lived, although we know that Sarah survived until she was 127 and was so obedient that the Lord blessed her with Isaac when she was 90. And it is fair to suppose that other good Hebrew wives were equally long lived and successful. Thus we see that obedience is of the utmost importance to the human race and is the source of happiness and prosperity. Still the women of this age are extremely stiff-necked and unreasonable.

Insomnia.

Slumber, hasten down this way,
And, ere midnight dies,
Silence lay upon my lips,
Darkness on my eyes.

Send me a fantastic dream;
Fashion me a-fresh;
Into some celestial thing
Change this mortal flesh.

When I know one may not choose;
One is helpless still
In the purple realm of sleep;
Use me as you will.

Let me be a frozen pine
In the dead glacier lands;
Let me pant, a leopard stretched
On the Libyan sands.

Silver fin or scarlet wing,
Grant me either one;
Sink me deep in emerald glooms,
Lift me to the sun.

Or of me a gargoyle make,
Face of ape or gnome,
Such as frights the tavern boor,
Reeling drunken home.

Work on me your own caprice,
Give me any shape;
Only, Slumber, from myself
Let myself escape!
—Thomas Bailey Aldrich.

Go Barehead to Church.

The custom of going bareheaded, which New York women have extensively adopted this summer, has spread even to the churches. At services which are held week evenings a large contingent of women attend without hats. "I hope the custom will extend to the theaters this winter," said a West Side man. "Then women will not have to hold their hats in their laps. I always feel sorry for women when they take off their hats in the theater. Their hair is usually disarranged, and taking care of a hat all evening is a nuisance. A woman never looks prettier than with a scarf of lace or chiffon thrown over her head, and it is no trouble to take care of that. Women wear them in London and why shouldn't they in New York?"

A Sound Indorsement.

The home team having been ingloriously beaten when it had victory practically in its grasp, the disgruntled resident of Mosquito Summit, N. J., remarked sadly:

"I'm just getting dead sore on baseball because it is so infernally uncertain."

"Yes," coincided his little nephew, who was on a visit from Boston, "baseball, looked at from any point of view, is certainly a fluctuating quantity."

Subterfuge Get Interviews.

Mme. Duse, who has a strong aversion to being interviewed, was recently beaten by the Copenhagen reporters. One acted as waiter at the hotel, another acted as shoemaker's assistant, a third drove her cab, and the fourth was assistant stage machinist, and all used bits of conversation for long interviews.

WHO IS KODAMA?

Power Behind the Throne Says Newspaper Correspondent.

If one asks who Kodama is there are two answers; one, that he is the chief of the general staff in the Japanese army, and the other that he is, besides, a poor unlettered man, who, at 52 years of age, rules Japan and guides her armies.

Richard Barry, the war correspondent, says, in "Port Arthur," that this man thinks while others sleep, and works while others eat. He is the power behind the throne, the adviser at the general's ear.

Many public men in Japan believe Kodama to be an unsafe person of second-rate capacity. He had been sent to Formosa, to "get rid of him." There he raised the place from savagery to a commercial prosperity. He could have been prime minister.

"No," he said. "I would rather pull strings than be one of the strings to be pulled. Russia is peeping up over the border. Let us prepare. Give me a desk in the war office."

So the critics were glad to get the upstart out of the way. But when the war came, one man had his finger on things, and knew when and where to strike. He knew the points in the Korean coast where an army could be landed. He knew how soon it could be transported there; where all the merchant steamers were, and how long it would take to turn them into transports; and he had the audacity of genius.

He was not a very presentable man. He had never traveled, and spoke nothing but Japanese. He would laugh like a boy at what he liked, and frown over what displeased him. And he scorned a frock coat and stuck to a kimono. But the emperor and the wisest heads about him knew what Kodama was, and although they could not, for pride's sake, give him the command of the army, they crowned him with power.

Bold Snake Captures a Pretty Milkmaid

Holds the Frightened Girl While He Drinks His Fill of Lacteal Fluid — Escapes but Injures Her Foot.

Miss Marie Czerney, daughter of prominent residents of Bon Homme county, had a thrilling adventure with a monster snake, as the result of which she narrowly escaped death by blood poison, by stepping on a rusty nail while trying to escape from the snake.

The young woman, with a pail in her hand, went to her favorite Jersey for the purpose of doing her evening milking. During the day the animal had been picketed in a tame grass plot, and at the time of milking still bore the picket line. The Jersey appeared to be greatly annoyed by flies and mosquitoes and changed her position a number of times.

As the cow changed position Miss Czerney would follow it up, and during this operation her ankle became entangled as she supposed in the picket rope. The cow seemed to grow quieter and after milking steadily for several minutes Miss Czerney became concerned at the small amount of milk in the pail.

Fearing that the pail had sprung a leak she looked full into it and attempted to raise it, when she was horrified by the discovery that a monster snake had its head in the pail, the weight of the reptile making it difficult to raise the pail from the ground. The snake had evidently been drinking the milk about as fast as it poured into the pail.

Greatly frightened by the discovery, Miss Czerney gave a scream, sprang to her feet and made a dash for her home. But she had taken only a few steps when she made the further discovery that instead of her ankle being entangled in the picket rope, it was the snake which was entwined around her ankle. The reptile was coiled so tightly and was of such weight that the young lady was thrown violently to the ground.

Finally gaining her freedom from the monster, which she was able to shake off only after superhuman efforts, she continued her flight toward home.

In her haste she stepped on a rusty nail, which penetrated the flesh to the depth of about two inches. Blood poison set in and only by the hardest kind of work was the life of the young woman saved.—St. Paul Dispatch.

Whisky Both Peculiar and Plentiful

Many Kinds of Fiery Liquid That Titillate Man's Interior Regions—The Old Sporting Drink That Killed Father.

The following is a partial list of the varieties of whisky now in stock in Tombstone:

Common whisky, the kind that killed father at the tender age of ninety-three.

Sporting whisky, the kind that makes the game rich and the player go the limit.

Business whisky, the kind that makes a fellow who never had any business in his life hold you up at every corner and submit a $1,000,000 scheme.

Mysterious whisky, the kind that causes your neighbor to lead you away around behind the Gragoon mountains with an air of profound secrecy, then confide something to you that was all over the town the day before.

Social whisky, the kind that causes a man who has known you for ten years and has never spoken to you to single you out and make a confidant of you.

Knowing whisky, the kind that swells the absorber thereof until the wise guy Solomon is on the bum.

Roaring whisky, the kind that suddenly sets the quietest fellow in town to vociferating and swinging his arms in unoffending space.

Fighting whisky, the kind that suddenly overcomes its victim with every conceivable species of pathos and makes of him a pitiful spectacle.

Bad whisky, exceedingly scarce, the kind that makes a man quiet, sullen and dangerous.

Loving whisky, the sort that causes him to draw near, put his arm around your neck and emit a breath in your face that would drive a turkey buzzard away from a dead coyote.

There are several other varieties in Tombstone, conspicuously honest whisky, which causes a man to pay his debts when under its influence, then kick himself about it when he gets sober; then the brand that causes him to do the agreeable to everybody he meets on the streets, then go home and lick his wife until the neighbors interfere.—Tombstone Prospector.

Cock Fighting Once Famed in England

Ancient History of Fighting Poultry Known as Dorking—Caesar Finds One Breed of Poultry—A Royal Sport.

That breed of fighting poultry known as Dorking has an ancient history. The Romans introduced it into England and taught the Britons to breed it for the table. But Caesar and his legions found one breed of poultry already domiciled in that country, imported by even earlier visitors, the Phoenicians. These fowls were kept for pleasure and diversion—that is, for cock fighting—and the breed was already many centuries old when the Romans came. The Phoenicians and the Greeks knew all about the game fowl; they drew their knowledge of the sport from the Persians, while in India, nearly 3,000 years ago, the fighting cock fought and flourished as it does to this day.

Cock fighting was a royal sport in England, though now and again edicts against it were promulgated. King Edward III. issued one, and so did Henry VIII., though the latter monarch had a cockpit built in Whitehall, so that he himself might indulge in the pastime. But no edicts could put an end to cock fighting, and it flourished under the Stuarts, though Cromwell prohibited it. There is an interesting record of the sport in the reign of Charles II. Cosmo, grand duke of Tuscany, while paying England a visit, went in state to the theater appropriated to cock fighting, a common amusement of the English, who even in the public streets, take a delight in seeing such battles, and considerable bets are made on them."

Cock fighting in England reached its zenith early in the last century. At that time distinguished visitors were treated by each corporation to cock fights instead of fireworks and music by the local band. Every sporting nobleman had his own strain of game fowl. The numbers that were killed in the ring were immense. In a single season in one town 1,000 cocks perished. In the Easter week of 1822 in one pit 188 cocks fought each other and $30,000 changed hands in wagers.

Men Beat Women at the Gossiping Game

Quilting Bee Gabfests Vindicated by Truth Regarding Predilection of Men to Talk About Their Fellows—An Instance.

"They accuse women of being the prize gossipers," said the man who observes many things, "but I have known men who for gossiping had any women I ever knew beat to death. The way in which they would pick up things and exaggerate them made me sick. Ordinarily they were real nice chaps, but when they got together they spent many hours picking other people's reputations to pieces. A story told by them without exaggeration didn't go in that society worth a cent. It would have to be wildly exaggerated, and, strange to say, the wilder the exaggeration the more they credited the story. I remember an instance where a young bank cashier when called upon to cash a check discovered that the name had been forged. He so reported to his management. The result was that the fellow who tried to cash the check was arrested. Though the thing was kept quiet, one of the members of this reputation destroying society got wind of it, and he told it to his crowd with a little embellishment. They in turn touched it up in repeating it and in a very short time it was noised about that the young cashier had been guilty of forgery and had been arrested. The young cashier heard of it and traced all the stories down. All of them he learned came from members of the gossiping club, and having had dealings with this crowd before, he proceeded to give every member the d—mdest licking he had ever had. It did them good. Whenever you want a conservative story of something that has happened go to one of those members and you'll get it."

Must Face Mother To-Day

Which Is to Drive Straight Home and Tell Mother and Surrender Me Dead or Alive—So I'm Waitin' Here.

I' got to face mother to-day, fer a fact!
I' got to face mother to-day!
And jist how I'll dare to, an' how she will act,
Is more than a mortal can say!
But I' got to face her—I' got to! and so
Here's a' old father clean at the end of his row!

And Pink and Wade's gone to the farm fer her new—
And I'm keepin' house fer 'em here—
Their purty, new house—and—all paid fer! But how Am I goin' to meet her and clear
Up my actchully heppin' 'em both to e-lope?—
('Cause Mother wus set—and wus no other hope!)

I don't think it's Wade she's so blazed ag'in
But his business,—a railroadin' man
'At runs a switch-engine, day out and day in,
And's got to make hay while he can—
It's a dangersome job, I'll admit—but see what
A fine-furnished home 'at he's already got!

And Pink—w'y, the girl wus jist pinin' away,—
So what could her old father do
When he found her, hid-like, in a loose load of hay,
But jist to drive on clean into
The aidge of the city, where—singular thing!—
Wade switched us away to the Squire, I jing!

Now—a-leavin' me here—they've driv off, with a cheer,
On their weddin' trip—which is to drive
Straight home and tell Mother,—and tell her back here
And surrender me, dead or alive!
So I'm waitin' here—not so blame' overly gay
As I wus—'cause I' got to face Mother to-day!

Through various causes we are late a day and hope our patrons will excuse us this time, and we'll strive not to have it happen again. We realize that you are all anxious to see THE UNION, so as to read what goes on in the county. Our esteemed friend, "Just a Voter," tells us that he thinks he'll have something to say in next week's paper about Roosevelt and converted democrats and "sich."

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

President Theodore Roosevelt passed through Clanton about 3:15 p. m. Tuesday, the train going very slowly, in fact slow enough to allow Hon. J. O. Thompson, of Birmingham, who was a member of the presidential party while in Alabama by special invitation of the president, to introduce Judge Reynolds to the president, who gave our judge a hearty hand shake and a "glad to meet you, Judge." There were close to 3,000 persons gathered to welcome the "biggest man" of the present day in the world. There were a number of decorations, but the prettiest sight of all was the school children under the care of Co. Supt. J. W. Moore and Principal R. L. Sessions. It was unfortunate that the President did not see the children until he had gone some distance, his attention having been attracted to the east side by the decorated arch, and a bouquet which was handed to him by an ardent admirer. Great credit is due Judge Reynolds for the recognition Chilton county received from the presidential party, for the Judge has been in correspondence several weeks with the President, trying to induce him to give Chilton county that recognition she merits as a republican county. Upon the tentative consent of the president to "stop about five minutes if the engine needed water." Judge Reynolds introduced the subject to a few citizens of Clanton at a meeting on Wednesday night of last week as to a special welcome and our democratic friends took it up so enthusiastically that they almost forgot that there were any Republicans in Chilton, the first committee of nine members only having one Republican on it (Judge Reynolds), but finding out that there were not enough democrats to make as big a showing as they would like to have a number of republicans were adorned with badges, which emblem would admit them into the charmed circle of rope. It is a positive pleasure to see the practical and conclusive contradiction thus given by many democrats to the statements made by them in the last two campaigns, both on the hustings and in the Banner, and as some members of their party, hailing from the country, said: "Well, Roosevelt's all right, and I sure did think that he wasn't as black as he was painted." From now on in our political campaigns "our friends, the enemy," will probably discuss the issues of the day in a sane manner and not just holler nigger, nigger, as in the past.

JUST SO.

A subscriber of THE UNION who also has an "ad." in our paper is so pleased with the results attained through us that he writes us a letter saying "THE UNION is all right" and closes with the following truth: "The man that whispers down a well about the goods he has to sell, never sees the golden dollars like the man that climbs a tree and hollers."

"BETTER LATE THAN NEVER."

The following program was only sent to THE UNION on Saturday last by Secretary A. B. Deason. This delay gives our readers very little time for preparation, and it is to be hoped that notices of this kind be given to us in future in good time to have at least two editions:

We cordially invite all Sunday school workers, superintendents and delegates from each school in the district to attend the convention. The Lord has blessed this work in every instance where the officers have held the conventions regularly and faithfully performed the duties intrusted to them. We ask you to co-operate with us in reaching the people of our district and in giving them more schools and better schools.

Yours in the work,
H. J. GROOM, D. Pres.
ANDREW B. DEASON, D. Sec'y.

A GOOD FIGHTER.

Editor E. C. Norton has had a long and hard fight against the court house robbers in Baldwin county, but he seems now to have got things coming his way, as Circuit Judge Anderson has ordered circuit court to be held at Daphne instead of Bay Minette. There are too many people in Alabama who seem to think that the laws are made for "the other fellow," not for them; and that they can disregard the law when it suits their interest to do so. Hurrah for Norton!

PLEASANT GROVE.

Editor Union:

There has been a great deal of sickness and some deaths in this community recently, but general health is better now, though we regret to say that there are some cases of sickness yet. Mrs. S. D. McCreary is suffering from chills, but we hope for her speedy recovery. Miss Irene Wright, accompanied by D. L. Ward, attended the camp meeting at Rocky Mount. The wedding bells are ringing again. On the 22d inst. at 9 a. m. Mr. J. A. Champion and Miss Mary Gibson were happily united in matrimony at the home of the bride's parents. The bridegroom is a very promising young man and makes friends wherever he goes, and the bride is one of our most charming young ladies and is loved by all who know her. We wish them a long and happy life together, and that their only troubles may be little ones.

A FRIEND.

MARS HILL.

Health of community is good. Crops are about gathered. People are having their cotton ginned and then haul it home for safe keeping until it gets over 10 cents. Brother farmers, unless you are absolutely compelled to sell hold your cotton till after Christmas; that's my advice, and many others agree with me that cotton will be at least 12 or 15 cents then. It would be well for us to begin and prepare as large a pile of compost and lot manure as we can and so save ourselves that large bill for commercial fertilizers this coming year. O. P. Scott killed a fine hog Friday, and has others in the pen, that's the way to prosperity. We are still inviting good honest farmers to join the F. E. and C. U. of A. and get in line with your neighbor. J. N. Scott and father (Bud) attended services Saturday and Sunday as I wrote in last week's paper, but the fact is J. N. returned alone, leaving his father visiting. What Bud's intentions are we don't know, but would like to. The Farmers' Union and Alliance was held at Pleasant Grove last Wednesday and Thursday. Ye correspondent was there on Thursday and had a grand time. State Lecturer Pinegar, of the Farmers' Union, gave a very able address to the people generally. Prof. J. H. Anderson opened school here on the 16th with a goodly number of pupils. He expects to have about a hundred shortly. It is very enjoyable to see the children flocking to school in the morning. O. P. Scott gave a candy pulling to the young people Saturday night, which was much enjoyed by all. Mr. Buck Smith died last week, leaving a widow and several children to mourn the loss of a husband and father. They have the sympathy of the entire community. We'd like to hear again from C. W. L., of Center Point.

DAD'S PLOW BOY.

ENTERPRISE.

Mr. Editor:

The latest topic in this neck of the woods is the "Grocery Man from Omaha, Neb." With the quality of his goods and the cheapness thereof, he has already done some good, and if he keeps on he'll do a lot more, and I'll bet 16 to 1 that he'll put some business men out of a job. M. C. Williams and S. E. Neeley attended the Farmers' Union (as delegates) at Pleasant Grove and report an enjoyable time. They say they found a prosperous, happy and progressive community, who are beautifying their homes, improving their farms and with the cause of the Farmers' Union at heart, and hoping for the day when they won't have to pay the business men so much for so little. Good luck to the people of Pleasant Grove. Now, old farmers, keep your eyes skinned and your poll tax paid up, for we are going to have a stock law election in the near future. It is claimed by some that the hog creates disease around these little towns. They do clean up the litter and that makes these little town councils sick, so they pass an ordinance prohibiting stock from running at large, and the old farmers who live near these places have to keep their stock up. It is unfortunate that we have these towns or the men that run them, one or the other. I don't know which, but maybe the good Lord does. I presume this stock law election will come when we have the school tax election. Let's all vote for the special school tax, and everybody (that can) join the Farmers' Union, and teach our farmers to be as proud of their profession as any lawyer that ever went down the pike. I favor a liberal taxation and when I go to the legislature I'm going to have laws passed so that our money will be expended to benefit the majority (not just a few) of the people. Well, "so long."

RED-HEADED BOY.

THE FIFTH DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION.

The Sunday school convention of District No. 5, Beats 5 and 10, held at Salem Church October 22, was a most gratifying success in every way. All the Sunday schools in the district were represented, delegates being present from Canaan, Friendship, Soldiers' Home, Evergreen, Chestnut Creek, Verbena Baptist and Methodist, Salem, Corinth, Shady Grove and Maple Springs, proving conclusively that the Sunday schools are rapidly becoming vitally interested in the district and county association. The convention was held under the most favorable circumstances, as the Salem church is in a prosperous neighborhood and is a comfortable, convenient and well-appointed building. Its members received the visitors and delegates with such cordial welcome and entertained them with such kindly hospitality that this good day spent with them will long be cherished as a most pleasant memory. An abundant dinner was served the guests, and their convenience was further considered by ample provision of corn and oats for their teams. The church was crowded at both sessions, and especial mention must be made of the quiet, orderly behavior which prevailed and the excellent attention given which is always such a help and inspiration to a speaker. Judge Joseph Carthel, the State secretary, and Miss Minnie Kennedy, the State primary secretary, were present, giving valuable help, because of their long experience and thorough knowledge of Sunday school work. The singing, led by Mr. Tillman Robinson, with Miss Robinson as organist, added very much to the pleasure of the occasion. The program included the reports of the president, Dr. H. W. Caffey, and of the secretary, Miss Meriwether; talks by Messrs. Judson Strock, A. J. Brooks, J. L. Long and Milton Robinson. Reports from the schools were given by W. A. Miller, John Norris, W. H. Strock, J. W. Patton, N. J. Calloway, W. C. Clark, J. L. Williams, D. S. Robinson, A. J. Brooks and J. L. Long. Election of officers resulted in Mr. D. S. Robinson, president; Mr. N. J. Calloway, vice-president, and Miss Lila Meriwether, secretary. This very successful convention is encouraging evidence that the association in District No. 5 is in flourishing condition, and we earnestly hope that these Sunday schools, banded together in this organization, shall feel the fresh interest, the quickened zeal, the new enthusiasm which comes always from working together in that liberal fellowship which is the strength and power of co-operation.

SECRETARY.

THORSBY.

Mr. T. T. Thorson arrived on last Wednesday's excursion with four excursionists. Some of them have returned to the North, but shall be back in a short time to spend the winter in the South. The card party given by Dr. Junkerman and Charlie Howard was much enjoyed by all present. The Norwegian Ladies' Aid Society met with Mrs. Dyrhovd on last Thursday. The P. C. Smith family have moved into the Hedberg home. The family from Chicago that purchased the Josephson tract of land have moved into the Franzen house. Mr. and Mrs. Gore, who are occupying the Thorson home, are both sick with the typhoid fever. We wish them a speedy recovery. The baseball game which was played on the home grounds between the Jemison team and our boys on Saturday was a very interesting game. It seems that the Jemison boys came with the intention of having an easy walk over, but our boys were not to be beaten. The score proved to be 15 to 14 in favor of the Thorsby team. If more of our girls would come and root for our boys they would play better. Let all the girls appear on the grounds at the next game. The gentleman who walked off with Mr. Howard's glove by mistaken will kindly return same to the owner. Mr. Sam Collins is having an addition built to his home. Mr. and Mrs. Lon Reagen spent several days of last week with relatives in Calera. Mr. G. W. Phalin spent Saturday and Sunday in Thorsby. Mr. J. Parnell took his wife to the Park Hospital in Montgomery on Monday. We hope that she will soon return home well and strong. Miss Kirkaby has returned to Chicago, where she will make her home in future. A large class of pupils were awaiting her return. Her friends in Thorsby regret her leaving here. Messrs. Don and Jay Caverno spent Tuesday in our capital. Many of our Thorsby people went to Birmingham to see the President and to attend the fair. The names that we could gather of those that went were: Mr. Paulson, Miss Tarina Paulson, Miss Alma Lefsted, Messrs. Ives Amundson, Hans Prestholt and Carl Seberg. The children of the public school and many of the citizens of Thorsby came to the depot on Tuesday afternoon to see President Roosevelt pass through here. We wonder who recognized or saw him? The young ladies' Sunshine Society met at the home of Miss Irma Ericson on the afternoon of the 24th Mr. A. H. Warner, of Montgomery, and Miss Hattie Horn, formerly of Thorsby, were united in marriage October 18 by Rev. Rice, pastor of the M. E. Church of Montgomery. May their united life be one of happiness.

LOCAL AND PERSONAL.

The many friends of Atty J. Osmond Middleton will be glad to learn that he has returned to Clanton, after a brief sojourn in Birmingham, and that he will continue in the practice of law with Col. A. C. Smith. These two gentlemen make an ideal law firm, and it is gratifying indeed to know that the old firm is to be continued.

A. Eiland was a pleasant visitor Thursday, subscribing for a number of papers and magazines, so that he can keep pace with the world's doings.

F. E. Hannibal and daughter, Miss Hattie, of Lomax, were in Clanton Friday. They were accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Ekblad, of Thorsby, where Mr. Ekblad runs the bakery, which business he thoroughly understands.

Ellis Mims was a pleasant visitor Friday.

W. R. Maddox, of Prattville, who has been visiting friends and relatives here the past week, returned to his home Saturday.

W. I. Friday was a welcome caller Saturday.

Judge Reynolds went to Rocky Mount Sunday to attend the camp meeting.

G. G. Gray was a pleasant visitor Tuesday.

Those "Studebaker Wagons" at W. I. Mullins' are going out fast. Our people know a good wagon.

J. C. Courtney was in Clanton Tuesday.

Rev. J. T. Eckford will preach at the Methodist church in Clanton Sunday night (fifth Sunday).

C. D. Higgins was in town Tuesday.

For a large line of good furniture at low prices you must go to W. I. Mullins'.

Rev. J. H. Thomas will preach at Mount Pleasant school house on the fifth Sunday.

Will Culp was in Clanton Tuesday.

Rev. I. Bice was a pleasant visitor Tuesday.

Chas. Johnson, of beat 2, was a welcome caller Tuesday. He came to town to see the President, having been at Santiago, Cuba, during the Spanish war as a member of the 6th U. S. Immunes, a regiment composed of picked men. Charley is likewise a staunch republican.

If you want to do some GOOD PLOWING this fall go to W. I. Mullins' and get a Chattanooga plow. That's the kind.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is hit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

Send Us Three Names

SOUTHERN COTTON ASSOCIATION

Chilton Co. Sub-Division.

To Farmers, Landlords and Tenants:

At the meeting of the executive committee of the S. C. A. at Asheville, N. C., the assessment on every bale of cotton grown by members was placed at 3 cents.

At a meeting of the Chilton Co. association the county ex. committee was empowered to enforce this assessment.

The amount is small, and it is hoped that those even not members will co-operate in raising it.

The association has already added millions to the wealth of our country and the price of cotton would likely now rule at 8 cents but for it. The public ginneries are authorized to collect this 3 cents per bale.

THE CHILDREN.

Do you love me, little children?
O sweet blossoms, that are curled
(Life's tender morning glories)
Round the casement of the world!
Do your hearts climb up toward me,
As my own heart bends to you,
In the beauty of your dawning
And the brightness of your dew?

When the fragrance of your faces
And the rhythm of your voices
Transform the sullen street,
Do you see my soul move softly
Forever where you move,
With an eye of benediction
And a guarding hand of love?

O my darlings! I am with you
In your trouble, in your play,
In your sobbing and your singing,
In your dark and in your day,
In the chambers where you nestle,
In the hovels where you lie,
In the sunlight where you blossom,
And the blackness where you die.

Not a blessing broods above you,
But it lifts me from the ground;
Not a thistle-barb doth sting you,
But I suffer with the wound;
And a chord within me trembles
To your lightest touch or tone,
And I famish when you hunger,
And I shiver when you moan.

Can you tell me, little children,
Why it is I love you so?
Why I'm weary with the burthens
Of my sad and dreary woe?
Do the myrtle and the aloes
Spring blithely from one tree?
Yet I love you, oh, my darlings!
Have you any flowers for me?

I have trodden all the spaces
Of my solemn years alone,
And have never felt the cooing
Of a babe's breath near my own.
But with more than father passion,
And with more than mother pain
I have loved you, little children;
Do you love me back again?

The Missing Board.

By Carroll Watson Rankin.

The high school boys of Carp City looked forward with joyful thoughts to the coming of "fair week," for the managers always found it necessary to hire outside assistance. In the big, broad-shouldered, eager lads the managers found efficient helpers. They made use of two at each of the distant corner gates to sell and collect tickets, four more for the same work at the main entrance, and others to aid the superintendents, some of whom were women, in the different buildings.

"Can you give me anything to do at the fair grounds next week, sir?" asked Edward Hicks, waylaying President Ware as he was emerging from his office the Saturday afternoon before "fair week."

"Yes," replied Mr. Ware. "I was just starting out to find two more boys. we want a couple of lively lads for odd jobs—to drive nails for the pictures in the art department, to tack up evergreens in the flower house, and to hang up the crazy-quilts in the women's building; in short, to do anything that needs to be done. Come out Monday morning."

Edward was all eagerness the first day, and his industry left nothing to be desired. Never had the superintendent found a more willing or a more capable helper; never had the patchwork quilts gone up so speedily or the pictures hung at such satisfactory angles.

Before noon of the second day, however, the novelty had worn off, and Edward began to find his work irksome. Every one seemed to want him at once. He found himself envying the ticket-sellers, who had only one thing to do, instead of a miscellaneous assortment of odd jobs.

Besides, the boy was working with a divided mind, for he was very much interested at that time in Belgian hares. He had that morning entered his own for competition. He hoped to make enough, between his wages and premium money, to buy a long-coveted rifle.

In addition to the task of seeing that his pets were properly housed and fed, he found it necessary to pay frequent visits to the bench show, to see how many other Belgian hares had been entered. But unfortunately, the work required of him did not often lie in that direction.

As he was returning from one of these visits he met the secretary, who bore in one hand a water pail and in the other a huge, fluted pie—no work was ever too humble for the public-spirited secretary.

"Here, Hicks," said the overburdened officer, "go fill this pail at the pump for Pauline Knight while I take this pie to its proper destination. Because it's a squash pie, some rattlepate thought it belonged in the vegetable department. By the way, I wish you'd take a hammer and some nails over to the judges' stand today and nail on a board that's been pulled loose on the west side. We've got fireworks stored in the room underneath. I'm afraid somebody'll carelessly throw a match in there, or if it should happen to rain the stuff might get wet. Don't forget about it."

"I won't, sir," replied Edward, starting with the pail toward the pump. "I'll attend to it right away."

But a printed cardboard sign that the wind had blown down and carried across from the portion of the ground devoted to the live stock fell at his feet, bearing on its scarlet surface in bold black capitals this inscription.

FANCY PETS
IN NEAT CAGES.

Edward picked it up and laughed as he read it.

"I'll play a joke on Dick Brown," said he. "I owe him one."

Leaving the pail of water at the flower house, Edward dashed into the main office for hammer and nails, and then set off at a smart pace for the ticket office at the main entrance.

The office was a crude affair built of rough boards. The directors meant when better times came to build a more imposing one. The opening through which Dick sold tickets was guarded by upright laths, making the place appear not at like a cage. Indeed, the ingenious carpenter who had built the chicken coops had used the remaining material to screen the ticket office.

Cautiously approaching, Edward tacked the gorgeous sign high above his head against the solid board at the left of the grating. The joke appealed amazingly to the crowd, but the unconscious ticket seller, not suspecting that he had become a "fancy pet," went on with his work with a ludicrously solemn countenance.

Well pleased with his prank, Edward was watching the smiles and grins on the faces round him when a small boy touched his elbow.

"Say," said the boy, "here's a note your sister sent you. I've hunted all over the place for you."

Edward tore open the envelope and found this note within:

Dear Ned:—Cousin Susie came on the noon train to go to the fair, but I have a headache and can't go. Meet her at two o'clock at the north entrance, and see that she gets a good place on the grand stand.

Edward looked at his watch. It was already almost two. The train, only half a mile away, was whistling at that moment. Edward set off on a run down the race track toward the north gate.

By this time he had completely forgotten the secretary and the work at the judges' stand. With a lot of Belgian hares and a pretty cousin on his mind, Edward had no thought to spare for anything so trivial as a loosened board.

One of the chief attractions at the fair that year was a spiral tower built of gas pipe, the work of a local genius. Up and down this arrangement trained acrobats rode bicycles and performed all sorts of daring feats. At night the final act was advertised to take place in the midst of glory, with fireworks spouting from perforations in the gas pipe and from a torchlight arrangement on top. The tower had been tested and been found to work to perfection.

That evening everything, including the fireworks, went off as advertised, and was voted an entire success. The show over, the delighted spectators hurried away to secure seats in the crowded homeward-bound trains. The persons in charge of the different buildings turned their attention to locking up for the night, and by half past ten hardly twenty persons remained inside the gates. The grounds appeared dark and forlorn, for only the small portion containing the buildings was lighted.

Suddenly there was a cry of "Fire!" followed almost instantly by a continuous volley of sharp explosions, coming from the direction of the deserted grand stand.

"It's the judges' stand!" cried the president, who had rushed to the door of the administration building. "Look! It's all ablaze! A spark from the tower must have got into those fireworks in the room underneath, but I don't see how, when the door was on the east side. I hope the acrobats are all out; they use that place for a dressing room, and some of them sleep there."

"Hicks," said the secretary, turning abruptly to Edward, "did you nail that board on as I asked you to?"

Edward turned white. "No, sir," said he, "I forgot it."

The next second the culprit had leaped down the steps and was speeding down the race track toward the blazing structure, from which rockets and Roman candles were still spouting forth.

Near the fire all was confusion. The fair grounds were a long three miles from town; the only available way of getting water was from the rusty, slow-moving pump near the stock sheds, almost half a mile distant; and at first no one thought of telephoning for a chemical engine.

To Edward's great relief, the acrobats escaped with their lives, but all their belongings were feeding the flames. The three who had taken part in the final act were still in their costumes.

The wind was driving the sparks toward the huge, new grand stand. If that went, the loss to the agricultural association would be very great. The gate receipts the year before had fallen off, owing to a continuous run of bad weather, the society was in debt, and ill-prepared for a fresh disaster. With anxious eyes every one watched the grandstand.

"Why don't you get shovels and throw sand on the fire?" suggested the acrobat in rose-colored tights. "I saw that done out west once, where they didn't have water. It worked all right there. I guess the rockets are about done shootin' by now."

"I'll get shovels!" cried Edward. "There's a couple under the office counter."

Off he darted toward the buildings. When he returned, panting for breath, the secretary seized one shovel, the president the other, and they began to throw sand against the blazing pile. The little band of spectators, following Edward's example, tore away boards, scooped up sand with their hands, and stamped out the flames that blazed up every now and again in the long, dry grass in the field enclosed by the race track.

Of course they could not save the judges' stand, but they could and did keep the fire from spreading across the track to the grand stand or over the field to the other buildings.

No one did better work than Edward. He looked like a chimney sweep when it was all over. He felt worse than he looked, however, for he was deeply chagrined. Beyond a doubt, his neglect to replace the board was responsible for the disaster. When the crowd had melted away he seated himself on the deserted grand stand and stared gloomily at the smouldering pile.

"That's the end of my rifle," thought he. "Of course I can't take my wages after this, even if they're willing to give me any. It'll take all my prize-money, and more, too, to pay for a new suit of clothes, for these are done for. They've a nice opinion of me by this time. They'll have to give up the show on the tower and pay the acrobats for what they've lost, I suppose. I hate to think of meeting the secretary. He'll just take my head—"

"That you, Hicks?" The secretary's voice floated up from the race track. "Are you too tired to go to town on my wheel and do an errand?"

"I shouldn't think you'd ever want to trust me again," said Edward, bitterly.

He leaped over the railing, however, and joined the secretary as he spoke.

"I was pretty mad at first," said the man starting off, with Edward beside him, toward the bicycle sheds. "But a burnt child dreads the fire, you know, and you've been pretty well scorched—I hear you've lost your eyebrows. I want you to go to town as fast as you can ride, wake up Sam Patterson, and get him started out here—he's got a horse—just as soon as he's awake. Put the wheel in his wagon and some back with him.

"When he's made an estimate of the lumber needed for a new judges' stand, you're to take it to Mr. Mead's house, get Mead up, and make him understand the he's got to get that lumber here by six o'clock sharp. We've got to have the stand done by two o'clock tomorrow. Then you're to go to the addresses on this list, engage these four carpenters, and have them here with their tools as soon as it's daylight. Understand?"

"Yes," said Edward. "You can depend on me this time."

"I thought so. I can't go myself, for I've got to take those acrobats somewhere and find beds for them. Ware's got them rolled up in rag carpets to keep them warm. Their tent was burned and all their clothes. I don't know which are worse off, the three that are shivering in pink and green tights or the two that lost their spangles; but I guess we'll find it easier to rake up every-day clothes for them than to get circus duds. I'll be back by the time you are, for it'll take Matthews and me half the night to straighten out the tickets and cash."

Tired as he was, Edward carried out his instructions with faithful exactness. He managed to snatch two hours of sleep before six o'clock, but he was careful to return then; for he could drive nails as well as any one, and he meant to do what he could to repair the damage that his unfortunate carelessness had wrought.

The secretary chuckled when he saw Edward helping to clear the ground for the new stand. "It'll be a good long while before he forgets to nail another board on," he said to himself.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR OCTOBER 29.

Subject: Power Through God's Spirit, Zech. iv., 1-10—Golden Text, Zech. iv., 6—Memory Verses, 8-10—Commentary on the Day's Lesson.

I. Zechariah's vision (vs. 1-5). 1. "The angel." The same angel who had shown Zechariah his other visions "came again." "Waked me." The prophet had slept after the first series of visions, and he is now aroused to be instructed further. 2. "Behold a candlestick." This was no doubt similar to the seven-branched candlestick of Solomon's temple, although the bowl, the pipes and the two olive trees were peculiar to this vision. The candlestick was, 1. A type of the Jewish nation, God's chosen people to shed light to the Gentiles. If they were willing to carry out God's purpose they could not fail. 2. A type of the Christian church (Rev. 1:20). (1) Its purpose was to give light. (2) Its material was precious and costly, showing the preciousness of the church. (3) Its seven lamps in one denote the unity of God's people. (4) There was a constant supply of oil, so the Holy Spirit supplies the church with the grace of God. (5) The candlestick was not the light, but held the light; it is the work of the Christian to hold up the true light, which is Christ. "All of gold." Pure in doctrine and practice and indestructible—the true ideal of the church. "A bowl." The fountain of supply of oil to the lamps. This is the emblem of Christ, through whom the Spirit is given. "Seven lamps." There was only one lamp stand, denoting the unity of God's people, but it had various branches and lamps, denoting their multiplicity in unity, and the number was seven, the symbol of their completeness. "Seven pipes." See R. V. Each lamp had seven pipes connected with the bowl.

3. "Two olive trees." The oil usually burned in the lamps was olive oil, pressed from the fruit of the olive tree. The olive trees, one on each side of the lamp stand, express the source of supply. The bowl of oil would soon be exhausted unless a continual supply flowed into it. The trees represent an inexhaustible fountain connected with the very nature of the Creator. The supply of power does not come through human ministrations, but directly from God. 4. "What are these." Even inspired men do not always understand divine teachings. It is sometimes wise to ask questions. 5. "No, my lord." If we would receive instruction we must be ready to acknowledge our ignorance.

II. The interpretation (vs. 6-14). 6. "Word—unto Zerubbabel." This vision was to inspire the people with confidence in their leaders as divinely sustained, and the leaders with confidence in their divine appointment to the work, and to lead all to the true source of strength and success. "Not by might." Of thy own. Not by their armies, for they had none. "Nor by power." Authority from others. "But by My spirit." The providence, authority, power and energy of the Most High. No secular arm, no human prudence, no earthly policy, no suits at law, shall ever be used for the founding, extension and preservation of My church.

7. "O great mountain." This was a figure suggesting the great work to be accomplished and the many difficulties in the way. The opposition from his enemies and the lack of zeal among his own people had tended to discourage Zerubbabel. "Become a plain." Be wholly removed. At that very time God was influencing Darius to refuse the desires of the Samaritans and give his favor to Jerusalem (Ezra 6). "Headstone." As he had laid the foundation stone, so shall he put up the headstone; as he has begun the building, so shall he finish it. "With shoutings." Joyful acclamations.

9. "Shall also finish." An encouraging assurance to the prince of Judah. 10. "Day of small things." Zerubbabel belonged to the day of small things. He did not appear like Solomon in all his glory, but more like a common man than a great ruler. He seemed inferior to the governor of Samaria, and was subject to the King of Persia. We people the past with heroes. We dream of a future full of heroes. But how blind we are to the heroes of our own day and our own time! This is a universal error. "Shall see the plummet." The perpendicular line with which he should try the finished work. He is master builder, under God, the great Architect. "With those seven." Referring to chapter 3:9. "They are the eyes of the Lord." In contrast with those who might be despising the day of small things, the eyes of the Lord were beholding with joy the work in the hand of Zerubbabel. The Jews themselves despised the foundation of the second temple because it was likely to be so far inferior to the first (Ezra 3:12). Their enemies despised the wall when it was in process of building (Neh. 2:19; 4:2, 3). "To and fro." A beautiful figure of God's oversight over the whole earth.

11-14. Three times Zechariah (vs. 4, 11, 12) asked as to the two olives before he got an answer; the question becomes more minute each time. What he at first calls two olive "trees" he afterward calls "branches," as on closer looking he observes that the branches of the trees are channels through which a continual flow of oil dropped into the bowl of the lamps; and that this is the purpose for which the two olive trees stand beside the candlestick. Primarily the "two" refer to Jeshua and Zerubbabel. Zerubbabel and Jeshua typified Christ as anointed with the Holy Spirit without measure, to be King and High Priest of the church, and to build, illuminate and sanctify the spiritual temple.

THE PULPIT.

AN ELOQUENT SUNDAY SERMON BY BISHOP LEONARD.

Subject: Giving Freely.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—At Holy Trinity Church the Rt. Rev. William A. Leonard, Bishop of Ohio, preached Sunday morning on the subject, "Giving Freely," from the text Matthew x:8: "Freely ye have received, freely give." The preacher said:

"Our blessed Lord had just endowed His apostles with some of His power. He had granted them authority to preach, to heal the sick, to baptize converts and to lay the foundation of His church. As all power in heaven and on earth had been conferred upon Him, so now He imparts the tremendous donation to them. This is what is meant by the divine origin of the ministry. But this power and those gifts must be utilized; they cannot be retained or buried; they must be dispersed abroad. They are given only for service. 'Freely ye have received, freely give.' In some measure we must generously give to the world.

"These words, however, may be taken from their primary place, so that they have a general reference and application for every child of the kingdom, and thus we use them to-day for our instruction and guidance. This text, 'Freely ye have received, freely give,' is classic in its clear expression and in its world-wide application to literature, science, music—in the art of centuries; and many races find their ideal in this fact, for Christ, the Incarnate, is Himself God. Christ is here in our human nature since the period of His incarnation. You cannot drive Him forth, for He has found room for residence in the very heart of this old world. It is of this conscious liberality of God to us that I want to speak, and of the sincere and willing response which we ought to make to Him for His gifts to us: 'Freely ye have received, freely give.' The gospel of our Father has this word 'give' written all through. Its first letter is the initial of His own name. Its first introduction in the Garden of Eden and a picture of the Divine Parent, whose hand is ever outstretched with loving intention to us, and it is His desire that we should realize this. The Bible is replete with the story of His giving and our receiving. Read your Bible this year with this thought in your minds. Recall what God has given to His children, and you will be amazed at the sum; it will be such a great one that at least you will be constrained to sing a benedicite, to praise God for His goodness; you will cordially begin to appreciate how 'freely ye have received.' Is it not well to make some sort of a tally, to run up our account with God? We who take so much for granted and simply accept the blessings He gives us without a word of thanks. We think of them and use them as if they were ours and are sometimes angry if we happen to miss or lose them. We have received so much and so freely from Him that we have omitted Him and His relationship from our calculations. We have credited Him only with our spiritual blessings—our religious privileges, the church and sacraments, of course, our salvation. But what about the ordinary things that He never forgets, that He never neglects? He keeps His work going on every day in the year, while we, like the children of our modern time, are satinted with luxury. We are aroused sometimes, as at Christmas time, to realize how good God is.

"'Freely ye have received, freely give.' Thus He gave out of His generous heart the very creation itself; the world and all in it, at the very hour of its conception, its power of production, teeming life, vegetable and animal. We take possession of it; we bargain and barter its fields and flocks and herds; we call it ours; we call the land after our own name. But these things are not ours. They are His. He controls, He directs and permits; we are but the tenants of His will.

"Then consider in the next place His providence. That is, the continuous remembrance of our needs—food, raiment, climate, and so on. The seasons that God only swings round in their course; the sunshine—think of the sunshine, that is God's gift. Suppose He covers over the sun for one day! Man cannot, with all his genius, manufacture another. Suppose it stops shining for twenty-four hours. Such a chill of ice would result that all life would go out. Do you ever thank God for the sunshine? No. We take it for granted—it belongs to us—we consider it our inherent right.

"God gives us power as well as creation to utilize. So lavishly spread that all man has to do is to pluck the fruits of it. We dig mines, sail ships, write books, paint pictures; it is only the exercise of power which God gives. Wealth, competency, wages, all the capacity of power—God grants it all. He gives the brains, the ingenuity, the business, the opportunity for every advancement and all you and I have to do is to utilize all the power He gives us. Some other men use these and prosper; other men waste them and are failures in life; but those who are opportunists in the best sense gain rewards. Do you ever realize that God could becloud and obscure your faculties of reason so that you would become insane in a moment? He might be excused from so doing because of your ingratitude, your neglect of Him, for all these things you call yours are His. I often wonder how many successful men can retain their self respect, can make their treatment of God agree with their ethics. They never enter His house to thank Him and yet He asks them to do so. They are getting on without Him they believe, but they are as helpless and powerless as the weakest imaginable thing. They are absolutely His dependents in whom they have their being. How long suffering and patient He is. His only rebuke seems to be found in His unfailing love. He simply says, 'My son, do not forsake Me utterly; hear My voice; come to Me; give Me thy heart, for I love thee, I am thy Father. I can afford to wait.'

"So with our virtues, they are all inbreathings of the Holy Spirit; every man, no matter how depraved, will have some spark of good that God put there to be fanned into burning heat. They do not grow there, they are given and are intended to mould and model us into a nearer semblance to His image. Your capacity of joy, love are from Him. You could find happiness or gladness or any kind of pleasure in the material, intellectual or moral spheres unless the Holy Ghost permitted it. You could not love your wife, your child, your parent, your friend, without Him. You Christians, you could not have happiness, love for God unless He grants you the power. Stones and earth have not. Animals only have as much instinct as He gives them, but you I have received more than this, have received inspirations and aspirations that reach from soul to soul, heart to heart. There is a beautiful prayer in the prayer book. I do not consider it in exactly the light in which I am presenting this truth. It is, 'God,' it says, 'pour into our hearts such love for Thee that we loving Thee above all things may at last obtain Thy gracious promises.' We could not love God unless the power were given us; we have not the capacity in ourselves.

"Now, the greatest gift of all; the gift of His dear Son. Creation, providence, power and faculties—can have no reason or right of existence unless interpreted by the coming of Jesus Christ to earth for you and me. The incarnation is the key to unlock the cause of our being. It is worth is the solution of each man's existence. It is in this sense 'The Light of the World.' Now God gave the best that He had, the very best that He was capable of bestowing. His only begotten Son. Nay, more, He Son is God. He gave Himself. We shall not try to explain its mysteries, it is unspeakable. It is an illustration of what God may do in small matters. It means sacrifice and surrender and unselfish giving, for He came to do God's will. That will was to save us from our sins. God gave up His best and dearest, the joy and sanctity of Heaven to clothe Himself with our broken humanity that we might see the godhead bodily, touch Him with our hands and go to Him with our sins and know that Him might accept Him as our Savior. He folded His eternal nature around His person and He led it forth to sacrifice, so that His earthly life was a long series of sacrificial acts. When He lay in the manger this life of sacrifice had begun; when He hung upon the cross it was the continuation of it. In the last moment of agony and shame He was controlling forces that seemed to be mastering Him. He was the priest upon the cross: He was His own victim. His life was not wrung out of Him; He, Himself, pronounced its dismissal. He gave it up to Him whose it was, saying: 'Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit.' All this for our redemption for our rescue and that we might have peace in believing and serving and following, for our eternal joy and peace hereafter in the Divine comradeship. Now, will I 'freely give?'

"This is our practical issue: the question of our life experience. How we give, and what, and when? Better try and consider the paradox of our lives. What do we give? When do we give? Do we give ourselves? Yes, but how? Is it unreservedly? Is it bountifully? Yes, we give something sometimes—some prayer, some worship, some money. Is it enthusiastic? At the price of sacrifice? Does it really cost us much? We give ourselves to this world—our time and ability with zeal and zest in business affairs. That is right. Christ does not tell us to be sluggards in business. But He does tell us to give in the same measure of earnest interest to Him—some measure of earnest interest to Him. I mean no standard of gold. I am not talking about gold to-day. I mean the measure of payment. I mean the full and long living surrender of everything to His will. I mean the consecration of each stroke of the laborer's brawny arm, of each device of the inventor's power, the consecration of our whole being and service to the supreme Master of our destiny. Such consecration makes life beautiful. It sanctifies labor, trade and business; lifts every project of human ambition up to a level on which angels tread and where we may talk to God Himself. It tires itself out in its arms for the redeeming of the world. It sees Jesus walking up and down in the earth and it must impel every human being to follow Him. It impels men to go forth into the world to others. The saint leaves his closet and goes abroad instead of pondering by himself homeless that he may carry the Gospel, that he may lift the cover of ignorance for some benighted soul; the missionary makes himself homeless that he may carry the Gospel to the heathen. Where we do the service of the will of Jesus is our free giving in return for what He has given us. Then and only then, do we expound the old tradition. There is the soul and spirit of the incarnation. 'Freely give.' the word. Really that means fully give. It requires us to say: 'Here Lord am I. I have no reservation. I prospect, no duty, no joy that I will place between Thee and me. I yield myself absolutely to every manifestation of Thy will. I am all the more eager to know what Thy will is. That is my duty; show me what Thou wouldst have me to do and I give.' The saint of old said: 'Master, show me Thyself and then show me myself.' Such a prayer should be offered from hour to hour, and then at last there will be the gradual glad consciousness coming to us that we have freely returned to God a thank offering.

"Then the giving of our time to His service and to other people will be as natural that we shall do it spontaneously. It will be so easy to offer money and heart and interest in Christ's service that it will be second nature."

Love Leads to Service.

A loving heart and an obedient life are inseparable. The one cannot exist without the other. As soon as a man loves God, he has the spirit of consecration, the spirit of obedience, the spirit of service; and while love continues to dominate the heart, the spirit of service manifests itself in the life. It is true that "love is the fulfilling of the law." Heart religion is the only kind of religion worth having. It is the pure in heart who shall see God.—Methodist Recorder.

MRS. EMMA FLEISSNER
Suffered Over Two Years—Health Was in Precarious Condition—Caused by Pelvic Catarrh.

HEALTH AND STRENGTH RESTORED BY PE-RU-NA.

Mrs. Emma Fleissner, 1412 Sixth Avenue, Seattle, Wash., Worthy Treasurer Scribe of Pheasance, writes:

"I suffered over two years with irregular and painful periods. My health was in a very precarious condition and I was anxious to find something to restore my health and strength.

"I was very glad to try Peruna and decided to find that it was doing me good. I continued to use it a little over three months and found my troubles removed.

"I consider it a splendid medicine and shall never be without it, taking some occasionally when I feel run-down and tired."

Our files contain thousands of testimonials which Dr. Hartman has received from grateful, happy women who have been restored to health by his remedy, Peruna.

Petrified Turtle.

While making excavations in Birmingham, Ala., for a residence the contractor found the limestone cast of a fossil animal that is thought to be one of the most interesting discoveries of the sort in local geological history. The cast seems to be that of some sort of extinct turtle or similar creature, and is about eight inches in diameter. Several local geologists have been shown the queer beast of perhaps a hundred thousand years ago, but efforts to fix its scientific classification have failed so far.

Japan's Meteorological Stations.

While Japan has had meteorological stations on some of her highest mountains ever since 1880, these were in use only in summer. Prince Yamashina, who is greatly interested in scientific research, has now provided an all-the-year-round station on Mount Fukaba, near Tokio. Dr. Okada, who is considered one of the most promising of the younger men of science, has been put in charge of it. It is expected that he will be able to provide information of incalculable benefit to domestic and foreign shipping interests. He is also in charge of the apparatus for registering earthquakes which has been installed on this mountain.

Origin of Playing Cards.

Playing cards are known to be of Eastern origin, but when or by whom they were first introduced cannot now be ascertained. It is, however, tolerably certain that they originated in Arabia and were brought into Europe during the Crusades.

Scandinavian Christmas.

In Scandinavia Christmas is celebrated in its literal sense of "peace on earth, good will toward men;" the courts are closed, quarrels are adjusted, and old feuds forgotten. It is the home of the famous Yule log.

THE SECRET OF YOUTH

De Soto looked for the secret of youth in a spring of gushing, life-giving waters, which he was sure he would find in the New World. Alchemists and sages (thousands of them) have spent their lives in quest for it but it is only found by those happy people who can digest and assimilate the right food which keeps the physical body perfect that peace and contentment are the sure results.

A remarkable man of 94 says: "For many long years I suffered more or less with chronic costiveness and painful indigestion. This condition made life a great burden to me, as you may well imagine.

"Two years ago I began to use Grape-Nuts as food, and am thankful that I did. It has been a blessing to me in every way. I first noticed that it had restored my digestion. This was a great gain, but was nothing to compare in importance with the fact that in a short time my bowels were restored to free and normal action.

"The cure seemed to be complete; for two years I have had none of the trouble. I use the Grape-Nuts for every morning for breakfast and frequently eat nothing else. The use of it made me comfortable and happy, and although I will be 94 years old next fall, I have become strong and supple again, erect in figure and can walk with anybody and enjoy it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason."

The Life of Pearls.

Pearls die. Maybe that is one reason why they are beloved of womankind. Some distinguished pearls forming a necklace of historic interest which belonged to the collection of M. Thiers are now the property of the Louvre. At one time this necklace was said to be worth $100,000, but it is losing all its original value because unworn. For many years these pearls have been in no contact with warm life that would nourish them. They are dying from the starvation of disuse. It has been suggested to the authorities that it were better to sell the famous necklace rather than allow absolute dissolution, as will certainly happen if it is to remain in its glass case in the Louvre.

Millionaire Day Laborer.

Among the common toilers at the Kokomo, Ind., plant of the Pittsburg Plate Glass Company is Robert H. Pitcairn, a young man worth $1,000,000 in his own right and heir to many millions more. He is a son of the late R. H. Pitcairn, of Pittsburg, multi-millionaire and president of the plate glass trust, whose death occurred a few months ago. Before his father's death young Pitcairn resolved to learn the trade from top to bottom, and he chose the lowest rung in the ladder for a foothold. He is now nearing the end of his studies, having lived out the routine of every department, carrying his lunch in a dinner pail like other employes, only a few of whom know him.

Clings to Chinese Dress.

Unlike most of the members of the diplomatic and consular service of the Celestial empire who come to this country, Sir Chentung Liang-Cheng, the Chinese minister in Washington, clings to the dress of his native land. This is unusual, for generally the Chinese and Japanese of the better class quickly adopt American dress when they come to live in this country. But even more remarkable is the fact that the sons of the Chinese minister also continue to be clothed in the Oriental style.

"To take a bath at Tiflis, in Russian Caucasia, is to court a never-to-be-forgotten experience," says one who knows. "The masseur who presides over the toilet of his patrons is a weird looking figure; his head is shaved, a rag is twisted around his waist, and his feet are dyed a beautiful red. You are seized by this individual, rubbed, pushed face downward on a marble slab, find his feet in your spine and his hands upon your shoulders. Then he grinds his feet up and down your back; they are round your neck, on your head—everywhere. Then he vaults lightly off, and in a moment, from a linen bag filled with soap he has squeezed clouds of perfumed bubbles, and you are hidden in them from head to foot as completely as if you had fallen into a snowdrift. BABY'S AWFUL ECZEMA Face Like Raw Beef—Thought She Would Lose Her Ear—Healed Without a Blemish—Mother Thanks Cuticura.

"My little girl had eczema very bad when she was ten months old. I thought she would lose her right ear. It had turned black, and her face was like a piece of raw meat, and very sore. It would bleed when I washed her, and I had to keep cloths on it day and night. There was not a clear spot on her face when I began using Cuticura Soap and Ointment, and now it is completely healed, without scar or blemish, which is more than I had hoped for. Mexico's Future.

In fifty-nine years Mexico had fifty-two presidents, dictators and emperors before the time of President Diaz. Cecil Rhodes did not believe in the stability of the country. "There is no guaranty," he said, "that after President Diaz dies Mexico will have any better government than that which prevails in the South American countries."

Tired, Nervous Mothers

Make Unhappy Homes—Their Condition Irritates Both Husband and Children—How Thousands of Mothers Have Been Saved From Nervous Prostration and Made Strong and Well.

Mrs. Chester Curry — Mrs. Chas. F. Brown

A nervous, irritable mother, often on the verge of hysterics, is unfit to care for children; it ruins a child's disposition and reacts upon herself. The trouble between children and their mothers too often is due to the fact that the mother has some female weakness, and she is entirely unfit to bear the strain upon her nerves that governing children involves; it is impossible for her to do anything calmly.

The ills of women act like a firebrand upon the nerves, consequently nine-tenths of the nervous prostration, nervous despondency, "the blues," sleeplessness, and nervous irritability of women arise from some derangement of the female organism.

Do you experience fits of depression with restlessness, alternating with extreme irritability? Are your spirits easily affected, so that one minute you laugh, and the next minute you feel like crying?

Do you feel something like a ball rising in your throat and threatening to choke you; all the senses perverted, morbidly sensitive to light and sound; pain in the ovaries, and especially between the shoulders; bearing down pains; nervous dyspepsia, and almost continually cross and snappy?

If so, your nerves are in a shattered condition, and you are threatened with nervous prostration.

Proof is monumental that nothing in the world is better for nervous prostration than Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound; thousands and thousands of women testify to this fact.

Mrs. Chester Curry, Leader of the Ladies' Symphony Orchestra, 42 Saratoga St., East Boston, Mass., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"For eight years I was troubled with extreme nervousness and hysteria, brought on by irregularities. I could neither enjoy life nor sleep nights; I was very irritable, nervous and despondent.

"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound was recommended and proved to be the only remedy that helped me. I have daily improved in health until I am now strong and well, and all nervousness has disappeared."

Mrs. Charles F. Brown, Vice-President of the Mothers' Club, 21 Cedar Terrace, Hot Springs, Ark., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I dragged through nine years of miserable existence, worn out with pain and nervousness, until it seemed as though I should fly. I then noticed a statement of a woman troubled as I was, and the wonderful results she derived from Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, I decided to try it. I did so, and at the end of three months I was a different woman. My nervousness was all gone. I was no longer irritable, and my husband fell in love with me all over again."

Women should remember that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the medicine that holds the record for the greatest number of actual cures of female ills, and take no substitute.

SOUTH'S GREAT PROSPERITY.

Government Reports Show Flattering Advance Along All Lines.

Washington, October 10. — Recent government reports indicate a great wave of prosperity sweeping over the south, and it would seem that this prosperity in the fair land of Dixie is not confined to any particular section or industry. It is widespread. From every state south of the historic Potomac river comes the glad tidings of good times. This phenomenal prosperity abounds in store, workshop, mine, factory and in the construction and improvement of railways. Not one discordant note is heard on prosperity's lute in the land of cotton and magnolia blossoms. Farmers are blessed with bountiful crops, for which they are receiving magnificent prices. The cotton manufacturer finds himself put to a strong test to fill the orders for goods he has from both foreign and domestic buyers, and railways are busy constructing new lines to new industrial centers springing into being day by day.

But the greatest evidence of prosperity at the south is to be found in cotton milling and the manufacture of furniture. In the past fifteen years cotton mills and furniture factories have sprung into being all over the south, especially in the states of Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia, and this good year 1905 finds them working overtime to meet the demands for their products. These cotton mills and furniture factories draw on the fields and forests of all the states of the south for their raw material. The railroads are assisting them very materially in their strides toward making the south a manufacturing empire by a most liberal policy in the matter of freight rates, both on raw materials and manufactured products.

The cotton mills of New England have hitherto had a monopoly of cotton manufactures in this country. The advantages enjoyed by that section in water transportation which guaranteed to eastern spinners very cheap freight, has in the past enabled yankeedom to maintain a complete monopoly in cotton milling. It is different, far different, today, however. The great railway systems penetrating the south, the home of raw cotton and virgin forests concluded to aid struggling manufacturers in the south and build up cotton milling and other manufacturing in that section. They reduced the freight on raw materials to the mills and factories, and on the manufactured products from the mills and factories to the markets of the east and west, which reduction placed the southern mill men and manufacturers on an equal footing with the cotton mills of New England and the furniture manufacturers of the west, so today the southern mill men and manufacturers are enabled to market their products at the very doors of the eastern and western manufacturers in competition with them.

As before stated, this liberal policy in the matter of freight rates on the part of the railways leading to the south has been the chief means of building up her manufacturing industries, the real cause of her present unbounded prosperity and the southern people owe a debt of gratitude to these land transportation companies they will never be able to repay in full.

"The commercial prize of the Orient has commanded the attention of the Occident for more than 4,000 years," says Hon. O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics. "From the earliest dawn of history down to the present hour the ever-expanding West has struggled for the control of the commerce of the East. This commercial prize has increased until its value has today reached the enormous sum of $2,500,000,000 per annum.

The grewsome murder on an English railway suggests that there are possibilities of things even worse than the always promiscuous and often indecently crowded conditions of American travel.

CONFERENCE IS HELD

By Ministers on the Right of Assembly—University Meetings Attended.

MAY BECOME SERIOUS QUESTION.

Strike of Railway Employes at Moscow is Paralyzing Traffic—Coming National Assembly.

St. Petersburg.—On account of continued meetings at universities with steadily increasing attendance, especially of workmen and other non-students, which are not only devoted to the anti-government propaganda, but also place the participants in grave danger in case of fire or panic, Emperor Nicholas summoned a special conference of the ministers to discuss the right of assembly with especial reference to university meetings.

The conference declared that the immediate promulgation of a new statute governing the right of assembly was imperatively necessary. It recommended the putting of halls outside the universities at the disposition of the students for meetings and the closure of the universities unless public meetings within their precincts were discontinued.

The last meeting of the St. Petersburg University was attended by 13,000 persons, of whom only a small portion were students. The gathering completely filled all the available room and blocked the aisles and corridors. The university council issued a statement declaring it cannot be responsible for the consequences of such meetings, pointing out that the inadequacy of exits would cause a frightful catastrophe in case of fire or a panic, which was usually precipitable in case of police interference or even a rumor of such interference. The socialistic workmen have resolved to continue their tactics of political obstruction and from time to time declare strikes of two or three days' duration. Under the law they cannot be dismissed, and therefore the employes of the big Obukoff Steel Works and the workmen of several other factories who did not strike early in the week have begun such a strike and have issued manifestos demanding the right of assembly, universal suffrage in elections to the national assembly and freedom of the press.

Many Roads Affected.

All the employes in the financial and auditing departments of the Kursk, Nizhni Novgorod and Muron railroads joined in the strike, but traffic on these roads is not interrupted. The station and tracks in the city are guarded by the troops and police.

Practically every road leaving Moscow is affected by the strike except the Nichalie line to St. Petersburg. Traffic is at a standstill on the Kazán road to Archangle. The shop men of the Kazan and Archangle roads have struck, and it is reported that train crews on the Kursk roads are deserting their trains.

Strikers Saturday forced their employes in the general offices and financial departments of three roads, the Windaw and Robinsk, Moscow and Best and Kieff and Voronezh, to leave their work.

Elections in November.

The elections to the national assembly will commence in the middle of November. On account of the indirect system adopted the elections will cover a period of ten days or two weeks. The governor of Kaluga province issued the fire election order, fixing November 12 at the date for the preliminary election.

All Traffic Stopped.

The employes of the Riazian and Versisk Railroad, an important artery between Moscow and Aralza, struck also. All traffic was stopped. The workmen demand an eight-hour work day and liberty of speech and of the press.

For a New Loan.

The negotiations for a new Russian loan continue without definite results. The American representatives will join the conferences with Finance Minister Kokvsoff for the first time.

Body Wasted and Covered by Bruises.

Fort Scott, Kan.—George F. Riggin, charged jointly with his wife and stepdaughter with starving a son by a former wife to death, was discharged at his preliminary hearing. After the boy died Riggin, his wife and stepdaughter were threatened with lynching and were removed to Fort Scott for safety. In the hearing Dr. Payne, who attended the boy on the day before his death, testified that the boy was in convulsions, his lips were cut and his body wasted and covered with bruises. The post mortem showed, he said, that the boy died inanition and malnutrition.

Boy Badly Hurt.

Henderson, Tenn.—Don, the 12-year-old son of C. M. Williams, of this place, fell from a tree and broke his thigh.

Senator Foraker Indisposed.

Columbus, O.—Word has been received from Cincinnati that Senator Foraker may have to cancel all his speaking dates for the remainder of the season. The senator is suffering from a severe cold.

Consul Smith Removed.

Washington, D. C.—Announcement was made at the state department that Alvin Smith, American consul at Trinidad, has been removed from office. The cause is failure to render his accounts, and is attributed solely to negligence and carelessness. Mr. Smith was appointed from Ohio. His successor has not yet been selected.

Grave of Albert Pike.

Washington, D. C.—The supreme council of the southern jurisdiction, Scottish Rite Masons, met in constitorial session, hearing reports from the committees on legislation, finance and library. The subject of the status of the army and navy was considered in executive sessions, but it was thought advisable to continue existing conditions. The members of the supreme council, its deputies and legatees, made its biennial pilgrimage to the grave of Albert Pike, Scottish Masonry's most illustrious patron. Approprite ceremonies were held.

Man Shoots Rival.

Lexington, Ky.—A wedding here was thwarted by the groom-to-be shooting an unwelcome guest. After a romantic courtship of six years William King, a horse trainer of Boston, came here to wed Catherine Sebre. When King went to the young woman's home to be married he met C. W. Scott, a whisky dealer, whom he disliked. They quarreled and Scott was shot just beneath the eye, and is not expected to survive. When arrested King claimed the bride-to-be shot Scott. The young woman denied it, and the police say they have positive proof that King fired the shot. King trains horses for R. W. Robb & Son, of Boston.

Praises Confederate Navy.

Washington, D. C.—High tribute to the efficiency, skill and daring in battle of the Confederate navy is paid in the annual report of the superintendent of library and war records of the navy department, Charles W. Stewart, made to the secretary.

Referring to the naval war records now being prepared under the direction of the superintendent the report says that the construction and performances of ships of the Confederate navy stands as a monument to the energy, skill and daring of Confederate officers and sailors.

Killed by Tornado.

Guthrie, O. T.—A tornado near Jennings, Payne county, killed two small children of Irvin Anderson, living on House creek, badly injured Mr. and Mrs. Anderson and demolished the house of Edward Root, breaking his daughter's ankle. The storm followed the Cimmaron river, and in Yale destroyed many homes.

Big Mortgage Filed.

Columbus, Ga.—A mortgage from the Birmingham, Columbus and St. Andrews Railway Company to the Central Trust Company, of New York, as trustee, was filed in the office of the clerk of the Muscogee superior court. The mortgage is for $4,500,000 and is to secure a bond issue. It has already been filed in various Alabama counties through which the road will pass.

Bank Changes Hands.

Sheffield, Ala.—The Sheffield Company, of this city, of which Henry H. Parsons, of New York, is president, and J. W. Worthington, of this city, is vice-president, has acquired control of the Sheffield National Bank by buying the interest of ex-Gov. Joseph F. Johnston, of Birmingham. The bank is capitalized at $50,000.

Two Blocks Burned.

Jackson, Miss.—Two blocks of the business district of the town of Magnolia, the county seat of Pike county, were destroyed by fire, starting at 2 o'clock Sunday morning. The total loss is between $20,000 and $25,000. The fire started in the store of Charles Verando, whose family had a narrow escape from the flames. Mrs. Verando went insane during the excitement.

Receiver Sought for Land Company.

Jasper, Ala.—A bill has been filed in the chancery court here by J. H. Hayes, a minority stockholder, against the Jasper Land Company and L. B. Musgrove, seeking to have a receiver appointed for the land company and an accounting of its affairs. The company has an authorized capital stock of $500,0000, divided into 5,000 shares of a par value of $100.

Killed by Gas Explosion.

Cloyd's Landing, Ky.—A report has reached this place stating that while at work at a gas well at Greensburg, Ky., Shelby Taylor, a citizen of Burkeville, this county, was killed by the accidental explosion of gas. He was about 21 years old and the only son of J. Ed Taylor, a prominent citizen and farmer of near Burkesville, and one of the wealthiest men of this county.

Charged With High Treason.

Budapest.—Nemed Denes, private secretary to Baron Banffy, the former premier, was arrested Saturday on the charge of high treason.

The arrest of Denes arises from his connection with the publication a month ago of the pamphlet entitled, "The Hungarian Crisis and the Hohenzollerns," in which the overthrow of the Hapsburgs and the establishment of the Hohenzollern dynasty in Hungary, were represented as the only way to the prosperity of Hungary. Baron Banffy has been openly charged with sanctioning the publication of the pamphlet, but has denied in most positive terms any connection with it. It is said that the police seized a letter in Baron Banffy's handwriting in the rooms of the author of the pamphlet.

Children Killed By Trolley Car.

Indianapolis, Ind.—Two children were killed and eight other persons injured, three fatally, in a crossing accident two miles north of Southport tonight, when car No. 9 on the Indianapolis, Columbus and South Indiana traction line struck a wagon loaded with a merry party returning from the country where they had been gathering nuts.

According to statements made by members of the traction car, the driver must have lost his way and in his confusion drove the wagon onto the tracks in front of the car.

Still a Mystery.

Memphis, Tenn.—Efforts of the police to discover the origin of the supposed incendiary fire which destroyed the building occupied by the Illinois Central Railroad company at Main and Madison streets, last night, were unavailing.

The flames which threatened to spread to adjoining property were confined by the firemen to the building in which they originated. The damage amounted to between $60,000 and $75,000.

Fire in San Antonio.

Grafters Get $6,330,000.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The report of the board of investigating engineers appointed last July by Mayor Weaver to examine the filtration of the city and the northeastern and southern boulevards, now under construction, which report has been submitted to the mayor, has been made public. It is signed by Maj. Cassius E. Gillette, of the United State engineer corps, who investigated the Savannah har- bor frauds, and John Donald McLen- non, of Washington. The report shows that up to date the city has lost through excessive costs, collusive bids, illegal advertising and in other ways the sum of $6,230,000.

The contractors who received most of the more than $18,000,000 that has been expended on improvements, are D. J. McNichols & Co., A. J. Ryan and John A. Keller, and Vare Bros. The members of the McNichol firm are Israel W. Durham, leader of the local republican organization; State Sena- tor J. P. McNichol, also a city leader, and the latter's brother Daniel. The Vare firm is made up of State Sena- tor George A. Vare and Edwin H. Vare. Their brother, William S. Vare, is recorder of deeds, an elective of- fice. The officials held responsible by the city for some of the conditions in connection with the filtration sys- tem are John C. Haddon, who was di- rector of public works under Mayor Ashbridge; Peter E. Costello, director of public works under Mayor Weaver until last May, when the mayor dis- missed him and John W. Hill, former chief of the bureau of filtration, who is waiting trial on charges of fraud and falsification of records in connec- tion with the construction of the filtra- tion system.

Yellow Fever.

New Orleans, La.—In the present condition of affairs it is expected that the current week will see the end of new cases of yellow fever. The num- ber of cases under treatment has fallen to twenty-eight and comparatively few active foci remain. Busi- ness is rapidly assuming normal pro- portions and the hotels are filling up.

Chairman Charles Janvier, of the citizens' committee, believing the struggle practically over, has gone east for a month. Mr. Janvier's re- port shows that with $60,000 received from the state, the total money avail- able here for conducting the fight was $260,184.81, of which $215,474.47 was expended, leaving $44,710.34 in the bank to wind up the campaign. The balance remaining at the end, which will certainly exceed $50,000, will go to the isolation hospital. It cost $26,- 625.70 to maintain the emergency hospital during the epidemic. For labor, $137,186.60 was spent.

Dr. Roger Post Ames, of the United States army, who remained here throughout the fever, having charge of the protection of the barracks against invasion, and who gave much of his time to fighting the fever in St. Bernard parish, has gone to the forts down the river, where he will do duty.

Governor Blanchard and party have returned to Baton Rouge. The gover- nor, before he left, looked deeply into the work here and expressed himself as believing that it could not possibly have been done better.

Togo Seized By Strong Emotion.

Tokio.—The great Shinto rites in memory of the naval officers and men who were killed during the war were held at Aoyama cemetery. Besides the admirals, officers and sailors, hundreds of civil dignitaries were present.

Admiral Togo addressed the depart- ed spirits, eulogizing their noble deeds in battle and their gallant co-operation which resulted in the sacrifice of their lives. He humbly asked repose for the spirits whose exemplary deeds in life had contributed to the victory over a powerful enemy. While read- ing his address Admiral Togo was seen to be seized with strong emotion which was in contrast with his calm demeanor while on the bridge of the Mikasa during the hottest battles. The ceremony was most impressive and calculated to leave a lasting im- pression on those who witnessed it. Thousands of sailors marched to the accompanying strains of music to the cemetery, and afterwards to the naval club.

"Royal Flush" Kills Him.

Huntington, W. Va.—Col. William Simms, a well-known stock dealer, fell dead at the Little Queen Club rooms here while playing poker. The game was a big one, and Colonel Simms had been winning steadily. At 8 o'clock a big pot was on, and several hundred dollars' worth of chips were on the table before cards were drawn. When the dealer helped hands Colonel Simms drew one card, and, after look- ing at it, gasped and fell back dead. It was found the colonel clutched in his stiffenings hands what is known in card parlance as a "royal flush." Physicians pronounced death due to over-excitement in cident to the great catch.

HOLD YOUR COTTON.

Is What the Cotton Association Says to The Farmer Now.

GET BETTER PRICES FOR IT.

If the Demand Is Supplied the Price Cannot Go Up—So Hold It for Better Prices.

Atlanta, Ga.—Farmers and mer- chants of the south are warned against cotton buyers who are now busy at many interior points trying to induce spot holders to sell them their cotton at market prices and agreeing to pay any additional advance that may ac- crue within the next sixty or ninety days. If you deliver up your cotton on that basis and the buyers get enough of the staple in their hands to fill their orders there is but little chance for the market to advance. The only way to force an advance quickly is to refuse to part with the cotton until satisfactory prices are of- fered. No middling cotton should be sold at interior points for less than 11 cents per pound. The crop is short, and all who hold will be rewarded as they should be.

Again, don't lend your cotton to lo- cal mills on the promise of settlement at any time within the next few months. With the staple in the hands of the spinners prices can never ad- vance.

Again, notify warehousemen to whom you ship your cotton for storage that under no circumstances must your cotton be loaned or sold until you are ready to sell it. All kinds of tricks and devices are being resorted to now by buyers and spinners to induce farmers to part with their cotton. Every man who is led into any of those trades is unwittingly playing into the hands of the buyers and against his own interest and that of his neighbors.

Hold your cotton like grim death. Tie up the spot market and stand firm for higher prices, and the victory will soon be yours and the continued prosperity of the south assured. Yours truly,

HARVIE JORDAN,
President Southern Cotton Associa- tion.

Plunges Through Bridge.

Lexington, Ky.—Passengers on the Louisville Southern train No. 9, due here at 7 o'clock, had a narrow escape Friday night, when the train was hurled from a bridge seven miles from here into a creek forty feet be- low. Twelve persons were injured, but none were killed.

The injured: W. L. Herndon, mail clerk, Lancaster, Ky., injured inter- nally and badly crushed; Joseph Thompson, express messenger and baggage master, shoulder broken and head cut, injuries serious; Prof. M. A. Scovell, Lexington, knee hurt; Wil- liam Hutchison, conductor, Lexington, shoulder broken, back hurt, cut about head; T. W. Hughes, Lexington, rib broken and arms and body bruised; Edward Dowling, Louisville, scalp wound and internally injured; J. W. Crossfield, Lawrenceburg, ankle twist- ed, badly bruised; J. W. Ripy, Law- renceburg, arms and legs bruised; James Foster, Salt Lick, body bruised and legs injured; Thomas D. Johnson, Burgin, ankle sprained and neck twisted; W. D. Donaldson, Eminence, slightly; R. W. Vaughan, Lexington, back hurt.

With one exception all of the pas- sengers were slightly injured and badly shaken up. The tender, mail and baggage cars and smoker were splintered and thrown into the creek, and the bridge destroyed entirely.

A more serious accident was prob- ably averted by the presence of mind of the engineer, A. Phillips, who es- caped injury. The tender of the en- gine jumped the track about 100 yards from the bridge, and realizing that if the engine plunged in the whole train would be pulled in after it he threw the throttle wide open and barely suc- ceeded in getting the engine across the bridge when the sides of the bridge were battered down by the ploughing cars. The mail was saved, but all the baggage was destroyed or damaged by water.

Farmer Is Found Dead.

Attalla, Ala.—Clinton Reed, a promi- nent farmer who lived near Attalla, was found dead in the woods near his home by one of his neighbors, Mrs. S. A. Shores. Mr. Reed left his home to go hunting in the woods near by, but failed to return when night came. About 3 o'clock in the morning a searching party was formed, and the finding of the dead body was the re- sult. A coroner's inquiry was held by Coroner Woodliff. Mr. Reed leaves a wife and two children.

Respect Uniform.

Washington, D. C.—Secretary Bona- parte has directed the dismissal of an employe of the Norfolk navy yard as a result of a complaint which came to the department that the employes, after having agreed to lease two rooms of his house to a machinist's mate serving with the reserve torpedo flo- tilla, refused to carry out the agree- ment because it would be necessary for the machinist's mate to come to his residence dressed in the uniform of a petty officer of the United States navy. The employe in his explanation to the department said that neither he nor his wife had any objection to the uniform, but owing to the prejudice which existed in the town of Berkley against sailors he felt it due to his family, in order to maintain their posi- tion in the town, that he should re- fuse to allow a sailor to reside in his house. After consideration of the em- ploye's statement Secretary Bonaparte holds: "That a person whose attitude towards the uniform of enlisted men is what this employe states is ineligi- ble for employment by this depart- ment." It is ordered that the services of the employe be dispensed with im- mediately.

Fires on Passenger.

Savannah, Ga.—E. A. Moore, a street car conductor, in an altercation with a passenger drew a heavy revolver and fired three shots. The first shot went wild, the second struck and killed Mrs. E. F. Wheeler and the third went through the thigh of C. R. Zickinger, the passenger involved in the alterca- tion. Mrs. Wheeler was sitting on her front steps. The bullet severed her jugular vein. Mrs. J. Fairchilds jumped from the car, as did the other passengers, when the shooting began. Mrs. Fairchilds sustained a broken shoulder from her fall. Moore was ar- rested. It is alleged he was drinking.

Democrats Offer No Opposition.

New York.—That there will be no opposition by the democratic party to the placing of the name of William Travers Jerome on the republican offi- cial ballot is practically assured. The certificate of the action of the recon- vened republican county convention in substituting the name of Mr. Jerome for that of Judge Flammer has been filed with the board of elections. The board will pass upon the question of the validity of the action as soon as possible.

Train Derailed.

Augusta, Ga.—A special from Green- ville, S. C., says: Local passenger train No. 11, on its way to Atlanta over the Southern Railway, was de- railed at Norris, thirty miles from this place, Friday evening. Reports here are meagre, but it is certain that Fire- man R. J. Hamilton, white, of Atlanta, is dead, Baggage Master Chestnut se- riously hurt, with the mail clerk, whose name cannot be learned, slight- ly hurt. The cause of the derailment is not known. The locomotive left the track and turned over, followed by three cars. No passengers were in- jured.

Fire in Columbus.

Columbus, Ga.—The plant of the Garrison Veneer and Woodwork Com- pany was destroyed by fire at a loss of $20,000. There was $12,000 insur- ance. A large quantity of crates await- ing shipment to Cuba was destroyed. The company will probably rebuild. The origin of the fire is unknown.

Accidentally Killed by Gun.

Tuscaloosa, Ala.—The news has been brought to the city of the death of John Robertson, who accidentally shot himself just as he was starting out for a hunt. It seems that he was standing on the gallery resting the butt of his gun on the floor, with his hand over the end of the barrel. The butt being near the edge of the floor, slipped, when the hammer caught on the edge, discharging the load, which tore his hand terribly and entered his head through his chin and neck. He lived only a short while.

White Man Hanged.

Tampa, Fla.—Edward Lamb, white, who shot and killed Christopher D. Kennedy, also white, in Manatee county two years ago, was hanged Fri- day at the county jail at Braidentown in the presence of 100 witnesses. Lamb insisted on having his photo- graph taken before going to the gal- lows, and was perfectly cool through- out. At the foot of the gallows he af- fectionately said good-bye to his son, sister and brother-in-law, kissing each of them and asking them to meet him in heaven.

Dared to Climb the Pole.

Bloomington, Ill.—Miss Florence Morner accepted the dare of a party of girl friends to climb the iron spiked steps on an electric pole at Peters- burg while returning from a social af- fair. She touched her hand to a live wire at the summit and was hurled to the pavement below, breaking her back. She cannot live.

YELLOW FEVER NEWS.

The Latest Reports From the Infected District.

Thanksgiving Day in New Orleans.

New Orleans, La.—There was noth- ing new in the fever situtlon locally. The reduction in the number of cases under treatment continues at a grati- fying rate. There is widespread satis- faction at the announcement that Dr. White will be permanently detailed to duty in this city.

At 11 o'clock tomorrow Rev. Dr. Beverly Warner, who was general su- perintendent of the campaign of edu- cation and the ward inspections, will conduct a special thanksgiving service at Trinity church, which will be at- tended by all of the marine hospital officers in full dress uniform.

Tonight a dinner was tendered Dr. White by the Country Club.

Chairman Janvier, of the finance committee, tonight announced that there was a cash balance on hand of $44,710. The expenses under Dr. White's approval up to today have been $215,474 for pay rolls, supplies and the two emergency hospitals. There will be expenditures of about ten thousand dollars more before the accounts are finally closed.

Pensacola, Fla.—The fever situation tonight is more encouraging than at any time since its outbreak here, only one new case being reported. This is the result of fumigation, which was actively commenced two weeks ago, but which is threatened with termi- nation shortly, as the state health of- ficer is meeting with opposition in his work. The courts have been appealed to by some citizens to prevent the fumigation.

Surgeon Wyman's Ideas.

Chattanooga, Tenn.—In a letter to Governor Cox, chairman of the general committee of the Southern Immigra- tion and Quarantine conference to be held here November 9 and 10, Sur- geon General Walter Wyman outlines the scope of his address as follows:

"I take pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 21st inst with reference to my attendance at the conference at Chattanooga.

"It will give me great pleasure to be there as I have previously inform- ed you. I write, however, in regard to my subject, 'Yellow Fever, Its Ori- gin and Prevention.' I understand that in giving this topic to me 'origin' and 'prevention' are general terms and do not relate to the recent epi- demic in New Orleans. It would be premature and not desirable for me to enter upon such a discussion, and I have no doubt that is your idea also. I understand that the deliberations of the convention are to be of a na- ture looking to protection in the fu- ture, but that it is not the intention to provide for addresses that may in- volve dispute."

Old Age Pensions.

Chicago, Ill.—Frank A. Vanderlip, vice-president of the City National Bank of New York, was the chief speaker at the Commercial Club's first banquet of the season. His subject was, "Old Age Pensions for Working- men."

He declared that the present indus- trial system was severe on the older workers, and advocated the annuity plan now adopted by many large cor- porations. He strongly favored a thor- ough investigation of the subject of old age pensions, preferably under the supervision of the president or the na- tional congress. He suggested that the Commercial Club request that such an investigation be made.

Tampa Man Is Robbed.

Louisville, Ky.—H. Crumpler, of Tampa, Fla., was robbed of a draft of $6,000 and $200 in cash at the Seventh street station here. Crumpler had just disposed of a furniture business in Tampa, and was on his way to Bed- ford, Ind.

Noblesse Oblige

As the ladies and gallants of Florence
Beguiled the black days of the plague,
Telling tales to forget the abhorrence
Of the specter horrific and vague;
So we in the City of Pleasure,
In the Carnival place of the land,
Shall bow to misfortune's full measure
And true to our colors shall stand.

As the good that the days have provided
We took in the joy of our hearts,
Our loyalty never divided,
In woe we are true to our parts.
No moaning nor any complaining
Shall tell of the sorrow we spend;
Our fathers' traditions maintaining,
We take what the Heavens shall send.

THE MOSQUITO'S BITE

BY HAYS BLACKMAN

(Copyright, 1905, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

The bank had failed and all that Dr. Maguire had in the world was swept away in the failure—literally all, for with the savings of his young manhood went the hope of making a home for the girl he loved. If it had been an honest failure, a money panic or anything save a defaulting cashier, it seemed to the doctor that he could better have borne it. But to feel that his work and his economy had gone for naught, that the savings of the hard years of his profession and the hope that had lightened the work were gone, while another man had gotten away in peace to live with the woman for whose pleasure this theft had been done, was maddening. The papers made the sensation of a day of the departure of the cashier and the woman who went with him. Then the depositors who had lost went back to their work forgotten but not forgetting.

Dr. Maguire gave up his practice in his home town in Missouri where there were memories to haunt him and where the accumulation of riches was slow, and went down to an unhealthy little spot in Louisiana where disease was always present and where medicine was a profitable profession. He prospered and again he began to hope that some day the home and the girl would be his.

One day—it was in July and the mercury registered a temperature seldom reached back in Missouri—the papers begnn to be full of rumors of the yellow fever. The plague was stealthily creeping across the South. The next day the rumors had become facts and from a city plague-ridden the ignorant masses were beginning to flee. On the third day two refugees came into the town where Dr. Maguire had taken up his abode. They were Italian laborers, and one man was sick when they reached the place. Before night the town had established a quarantine station and the two Italians were held there. The one was in the clutches of the fever, and the other so badly frightened that he easily fell a victim to the disease. The first man died and the second followed his example, but not before the town, in spite of all precautions, had become another of those pest centers whence the line of the plague swept steadily onward, like the creeping evil of a prairie fire through dry grass.

Thenceforth there was work for the doctor's hands. Early and late through the fever-fretted town he went to his errands of mercy. He had given but little study to the fever, but now, with ample opportunity for study afforded him he was too busy bringing healing or closing the eyes of the dead to give time to experimenting with the bites of mosquitoes, or the danger of infection through contact with the disease.

One evening the doctor went in answer to a summons to a house without the town. The place was a lonely one, five miles from the city, just within the cordon that the quarantine had drawn about the town. Evidently the house was the home of people of wealth. It was a handsome structure, but it was seemingly deserted.

"Tell me his name."

The doctor found in an upper room a woman dying of the plague. Before the end came that night she was able to tell the doctor something that he had long wanted to know. Little by little she whispered her story. She had left the North with a man who had done much evil for her sake. He had betrayed a trust reposed in him. He was a thief and a fugitive from justice. They had lived there very quietly to avoid discovery, so quietly and so alone that they had not known of the coming of the fever until the quarantine lines had been drawn around them. The man was a craven coward, shuddering in fear of the disease and when the woman had shown symptoms of the plague he fled, leaving her to die alone. She paused, apparently unable to go on. "His name," Dr. Maguire urged, "tell me his name." He shook the dying woman roughly, all else forgotten in the eagerness that was upon him. She roused sufficiently to whisper the name. And the doctor knew that his revenge was near. Somewhere, in the vicinity of the town, with the quarantine lines drawn tightly about him, caught like a rat in a trap, was a man who fled from a town in Missouri with the savings of his neighbors and his friends. Dr. Maguire was almost happy as he rode back to town.

"If you die, I shall have give.. you what you deserve."

Skirting the streets of the plague ridden town a man crept, hiding in dark corners, crawling along the ground, terrified at the death that threatened old and young, nor spared for prayers and promises the man who feared to die. Dr. Maguire, riding in late that night, almost overrode the crouching figure. And when he had stooped from his saudle to set the groveling wretch upon his feet he knew who it was that crawled in the dark. His revenge was at hand. The defaulter, too, recognized the doctor. And in Dr. Maguire's eyes he read that the time of reckoning was at hand. He fell on his face at the doctor's feet, all manhood fallen from him, leaving him only a groveling, frightened, abject thing that crawled in the dust. "Mercy," he begged, his face hidden.

"Mercy," the doctor repeated. "Did you think of mercy when you robbed men and women of their all, when you stole the widow's mite and left orphaned children to go hungry? Did you think of mercy when you blasted a man's hopes and left him hard and merciless and with the passion of revenge eating at his heart? Mercy for such as you? Never! And the woman for whom you sinned—you could not even keep faith with her. You deserted her when she was dying and left her to meet the end alone. Mercy? I am going to kill you like the dog that you are. It's what I have been wanting to do these many months."

The man at his feet licked the dust and tore his hair with impotent fingers. "My life," he begged again. "Spare my life. Only let me live. I'll give the money back to you."

Dr. Maguire smiled a diabolical smile. "So be it," he said. "You shall have your life since you are so fearful of death. I will give you a chance. You shall try your luck with fate. They say that the mosquito's bite breeds the fever. For me, I do not know. But you shall take the chance. We'll let the mosquito bite you, and if you live well and good. But if you die, I shall have given you what you deserve."

He drew the cowering fugitive roughly to his feet and with his horse's bridle thrown across his arm led his captive down the street to the office of a fellow physician who had been experimenting with the mosquito theory. The fugitive saw the doctor place one of the mosquitoes near and nearer his arm. He turned his head away, shivering. There was the sharp sting of the insect's bite, and the fugitive slipped to the floor in a faint.

The doctor kept his enemy with him in the days that followed, watching the man's every movement. In due time the fever developed. Dr. Maguire seemed surprised that it should be so. The patient was hysterical with fright. He had worked himself into a frenzy of fear and so had made himself an easy prey to the plague. And he died, died of the fever in its worst form.

Dr. Maguire's friend, the physician who was interested in the mosquito theory, rubbed his hands complacently. "This proves the experiments absolutely in my opinion," he said. "The man had positively no symptoms of the disease. Its development and his subsequent death were due to the bite of the mosquito." Dr. Maguire smiled strangely. "What would you say," he said slowly, "if I told you that the man was not bitten by a mosquito? At the last moment, when he turned his head aside as I held the insect above his arm, I thrust the point of a pin into the flesh instead of allowing the mosquito to bite him. The man died of fright, pure and simple. Or else he took the fever from infection. The woman had the plague, you know, when the man fled from her."

PROPER CARE OF HEADGEAR.

How Hats May Be Worn Long and Always Look Well.

No article of dress becomes shabby so quickly, for want of a little care, as a hat; light, air and dust all tend to turn it brown, if it is exposed to their influences; it ought therefore to be kept in a hat box whenever it is not in use. On ordinary occasions a soft brush should be used.

When the hat is wet it should never be wiped with a pocket handkerchief (unless a clean one is specially used for that purpose), but the superfluous moisture should be taken off with a dry soft cloth.

If it has received only a partial sprinkling, and a rough mottled appearance is left, dip a hat brush lightly in cold water and pass it gently round in the same direction as the nap.

When all parts are uniformly damp, take a hard brush, and with that bring the nap to its former state of evenness; then lay the hat on its side on a clean cloth for the night to dry.

After it has been brushed with the ordinary hat brush next morning, it will look little the worse for the wetting it has undergone. The better the quality of the hat, the more times may this be repeated without injuring it.

Bulges or indentations may be removed by warming the hat (by steam is preferable) and taking them out with a hot iron. Any attempts to restore the shape by other means will probably result in cracking the hat.

Gloss may be removed, when after some wear the nap becomes dull and gray looking, by brushing with a hot brush, or, better, by gently pressing a three times round in the direction of flatiron, ordinarily heated, two or the nap.

Pure Obstinacy.

A little girl who reads nature books, studies natural history and is devoted to pets, was discovered holding bunny in her lap, trying to direct his attention to a book that she had and ever and anon boxing his long ears vigorously. Auntie was shocked, of course, and inquired what was the moving cause of such cruelty.

"He's so stubborn," replied the little teacher.

"A rabbit stubborn! Why, child, I never heard of such a thing. What is he stubborn about?"

"I'm trying to teach him the multiplication table, and he just won't try to learn, nor even say it over after me. Now, you say it, sir, 'Three times two are six—three times three are nine.'"

But the rabbit didn't say it, and again auntie inquired into her little niece's conduct as two or three more cuffs were administered to the poor creature's all too convenient ears.

"Why, auntie," explained the girl, "the books all say that rabbits multiply faster than any other animals, and this obstinate little creature won't even go through the three times three with me."—Lippincott's.

Had Faith In It.

Admiral William G. Buehler, at a dinner at Hot Springs, Va., said of a Philadelphia editor:

"He is a good man, an enthusiast. His paper prospers because he believes in it, because he has faith in it.

"And what faith in it he has! He reminds me of the Yankee with the accurate watch.

"This Yankee, an elderly man, had a watch that for thirty or forty years had never once gone wrong. Hence he boasted about it at all times.

"With a guest from Boston he rose one August morning to see the sun rise, and as they waited for its rising the Yankee kept consulting first his watch, which was in his right hand, and then a farmers' almanac, giving the sun's schedule, which was in his left.

"There was a long wait in the pale, vague dawn. Then, tapping his watch with his forefinger, the Yankee said:

"'If the sun ain't over that hill in a minute and a half he'll be late.'"—Buffalo Inquirer.

Will Return for Cincinnati Festival.

Sir Edward Elgar, the composer, who sailed recently for Europe, will return to this country next spring to serve as one of the conductors of the Cincinnati Hay biennial festival. This is the result of a series of negotiations conducted by the Cincinnati Musical Festival association. An important clause in the agreement provides that the well-known English composer is not to appear as conductor elsewhere during this visit.

Rumors and Roomers.

"I just heard of a fellow who took a room up at that big hotel," said the first summer man, "and when he got a chance stole a lot of money from the other inmates."

"Yes?" said Jokeley; "another case of a bad roomer gaining currency."

NEVER HEARD OF BEN BUTLER.

Incident of the Rebellion Recalled by Police-Court Case.

If it had not been for history relating the silverware incident of a certain federal general in New Orleans during the occupation by union troops one of Tartown's most prominent citizens would not now be doing time on the chain gang, says the New Orleans Times-Democrat. As it is, Ben Butler is suffering partly because of the odium attached to his name and partly because he followed the well-known example of that military martinet and drank deep of the rosy wine—slightly mixed with "coke."

"What do you think you've got to say for yourself, Benjamin Butler?" said Recorder Marmouget. "Are you the Ben Butler who took those spoons?"

"Lordy, boss, dey ain' bringin' up dat ole matter, is dey?" exclaimed Ben with a startled look. "I done mer time fer dat too long ergo ter talk erbout, jedge. I onderstan'in I ben charge wid bein' drunk, w'ich I wuz, boss, but dem spoons am er nudder matter."

"So you did steal spoons, eh?" exclaimed his honor. "You followed the precepts of your distinguished namesake and swiped the silverware. This is where history repeats itself."

"Yasser, I did stole dem spoons, jedge, dat were fo' yeah ergo, but I doan kno' nuttin' 't all 'bout dat yuther Ben Butler. Dat mus'er ben some yuther case, jedge."

"Yes, I expect it was, Ben," replied his honor, "but that does not dispose of the drunk case, and I'll give you ten days in the workhouse. That will afford you time in which to read up history and become posted on the only and original spoon thief whose name you bear. Take him out."

Mrs. B. Got There First.

"This," said the jeweler, "is what happened here last month.

"Mr. B. drove up in his hansom and entered my shop, accompanied by his valet, who carried an oblong box of steel. Mr. B. asked for a private interview and I took him into my office. There he opened the box, exposing a splendid array of diamond and pearl necklaces, earrings, tiaras and stomachers.

"'Mrs. B.,' he said, 'is now abroad. Before she returns I want you to extract all these stones and to replace them with good imitations, selling the real jewels and giving me the money. This, of course, is to be a confidential transaction. Mrs. B. is to know nothing of it.'

"I looked at Mr. B. I think I blushed a little.

"'My dear sir,' I said, 'I should be glad to do what you ask, but it is impossible. Two years ago Mrs. B. called here on the same errand that now brings you, and this errand, in her case, was successful. The paste jewels that you offer me are worth little more than the hire of the hansom awaiting you outside.'"

One About Ducks.

Here seems to be a nice, cool stream for one of Frank N. Busch's duck yarns. Mr. Busch was up in the Fox river country, staying at a farmer's house. One morning the farmer held up two live ducks in his hands and exclaimed:

"Ain't they fine canvas backs? Gee, but I had to pay for 'em, too—cost $4 apiece. But they are raisers. Next year from these I'll have ducks enough to stock a marsh."

"Canvas backs, your grandfather," replied Mr. Busch. "They are blue mud hens, both of them."

"No, no. I know the man that raised 'em; sold him the corn that he fed to them—I know."

The dispute grew thick and furious. Mr. Busch happened to have an illustrated book on ornithology in his trunk. He brought it out and showed the farmer the difference in looks. The man of the hoe and the ducks shook his head ruefully for a moment. Suddenly his face brightened. He said: "Your book sho' looks like I done been cheated; but, may be, they done issued a later edition."

Elephants Destroy Telegraph Line.

Elephants have lately destroyed a portion of the transcontinental telegraph line at a point eighty-five miles north of Bismarcksburg, in German East Africa, consequently communication is temporarily interrupted with Udjidji, northern Tanganyika. The telegraph line traverses a country teeming with large game, which is a source of immense annoyance to those engaged in maintaining through service with the eastern shores of Tanganyika and the regions beyond. There has been an invasion of elephants into that portion of northeastern Rhodesia adjacent to Lake Bangewelo. These animals have devastated native crops and frequently enter the settlement, when they destroy large quantities of grain that the natives have stored for their use during the dry season.

Napoleon Expressed His Surprise.

Napoleon Gaudette, a French-Canadian, who was for many years an operative in one of the cotton mills in the south part of Grafton, Mass., returned there for a few days' visit. He showed great interest at the various changes that had occurred in the village, and when told that this family had gone back to Canada and that one had moved to Fall River, and that John Thibideau was married, etc., etc., to each he made the same comment, uttered in a slow, surprised way: "Is dat so? Din't use be so."

"Where's ole Mis Planchette?" he asked.

"Mrs. Planchette? Oh, she died a year ago," was the reply.

"Is dat so? Din't use be so."

The Sturdy Spirit of the Northwest

Adaptable, Energetic and Optimistic, It Has Created Great Wealth Out of the Unbounded Opportunities of Nature.

The horseback era followed the navigation of the streams, and then the railroad came to hang the great spaces of the west with cities like long circuits of electric lights waving along a boulevard.

With the railroad the westerner passed away, leaving the American citizen proud of his section. With the railroad came the period of town building and town booming wherein the men from the west, traveling westward in a Pullman, endeavored to make fortunes overnight in real estate gambling. It took the collapse of the boom and the awful years that made Kansas bleed to teach them that they had found a new empire.

In these men are now blended the traits of the cowboy and of the real estate man, of the vigilante and the student of law, but added to all these is the conservatism of the capitalist and the responsibilities of success. They "plunge" less now, since they have more to protect. But they are the same adaptable, energetic, optimistic spirits who pushed the pioneer ahead and created for themselves great wealth where only opportunity awaited their coming. They are still pushing.

There are the men who have made that three-fifths of the nation which lies west of Chicago so safe that the cliff dwellers of Manhattan have grown richer by selling them their wares—from steel bridges to magazines, from life insurance to Massachusetts state bonds. Their one care is a constant watch for opportunity and their rule of honor is respect for every other man's right to try.

They laugh when they win because success in a successful country need not be taken too seriously. They laugh also when they fail, because nature amid so many opportunities is ludicrous. They are crude and they must meet their social problems in their wives' names. Their optimism is the optimism of plenty; their conceit grows out of their achievements.

The New Yorker scornfully says: "Why should I go west? I have everything that is worth seeing right here in New York."

To this the American replies: "Yes, everything except the United States of America."

"You think you are the whole nation," says the New Yorker.

"No," says the American. "I'm only a part owner. But I know my country and my partners. You don't."—World's Work.

"Devil Clock" in Old Mexican Town

Local Watch Repairer Made Timepiece All Right, but Could Not Regulate the Striking Part of His Handiwork.

In my travels in Mexico I visited a city which has a town clock in a high tower, and this clock does not run, says a writer in the Kansas City Star. I learned its history from the inhabitants. It appeared that one of the leading citizens of the town had visited the United States, and when he returned to his native city he insisted that the town ought to have a public clock. He called a meeting of citizens, laid the plan before them, and they subscribed $400 for a town clock. They engaged a local watch repairer to build the clock and gave him orders that it must strike the hours. He had never seen a town clock, but he sent to a coast town and secured a small marine striking clock, and with it as a model he constructed, by mathematical expansion, a large clock and placed it in the tower. It was advertised to begin running at 8 o'clock, and as it was a great event in the town's history most of the population gathered in the plaza to see the clock start and hear it strike. When the hour came the clock struck correctly and continued to strike correctly until 1 o'clock, when it struck up to sixty-one. When 2 o'clock came the clock struck 113 times. The whole town rushed out to see what was the matter. It happened that the builder of the clock lived at one end of the town, and when he heard it striking up to 113 he leaped out of bed, seized a wrench and ran down the middle of the street to the plaza, climbed the tower and stopped it. Thereafter he was to be seen every hour running down the street with a wrench, the whole town cheering and laughing, while he climbed the tower to prevent the striking apparatus from running away. The poor man put up with this only a few months, and then he ran away and never returned. Since his disappearance the clock has never run. It is called the devil clock.

Worship of Stones an Ancient Custom

Relics of Its Practice Found All Over the World—Some of the Most Prominent of Known Instances.

When the Japanese captured Mukden they found the black stone of the Manchu dynasty, regarded by the Manchus as marking the center of the universe. Even without possession of the sacred rock it looks as if the Japanese were putting themselves pretty much in the middle of things, and making the rest of the world spin about their island kingdom.

The worship of stones was an ancient and universal custom, and relics of its practice are found all over the world. Up to the end of the nineteenth century the peasants of the Norwegian mountains cherished round stones, which they kept in a comfortable bed of fresh straw. Once a week these stones were carefully washed, smeared with butter or steeped in ale, and they were treated with great respect in order that they might bring good luck to the house.

Kaaba, the holy stone of Mecca, is worn and polished by the kisses of the crowding pilgrims; while the Dorjing of Lhasa, Tibet, marks another center of the universe.

There are other stones of legendary or historical interest which have played a practical part in national or civil life. The Stone of Scone was originally supposed to be the ancestral god of the Irish Scots. It was kept in the gray old castle of Dunstaffnage until it was carried to Scone, and the Scottish kings were crowned upon it. Edward I. carried it to Westminster abbey, and it forms the seat of the coronation chair used by all the British sovereigns.

The London Stone marked the meeting-place of the Roman roads which ran through the kingdom, and from it all distances were reckoned. It was supposed to have been brought from Troy, and is mentioned in very early records. To-day a fragment of it is embedded in the wall of St. Swithin's church, London, and protected by a strong iron grille.

Words of Kindness That Mean Much

"It's the Kind Word and the Thought for the Deed Done and the Doer, Out of Which the Good Is Wrought."

Cultivate kindness of heart; think well of your fellow men; look with charity upon the shortcomings in their lives; do a good turn for them as opportunity offers; and, finally, don't forget the kind word at the right time.

How much a word of kindness, encouragement or appreciation means to others, sometimes, and how little it costs us to give it.

We do not need to wait for some special occasion, says the Philadelphia Inquirer. When calamity overtakes a friend, words of sympathy and encouragement are offered sincerely enough, yet in certain respects, as a matter of course. Such an occasion calls for expression on our part, and we naturally respond. But why wait for an occasion? Why not speak the kind word when there is no special occasion to make it obvious?

In the course of our lives there must be many times when thoughtless words are spoken by us which wound the hearts of others. And there are also many little occasions when the word of cheer is needed from us, and we are silent.

There are lives of wearisome monotony which a word of kindness can relieve. There is suffering which words of sympathy can make more endurable. And often, even in the midst of wealth and luxury, there are those who listen and long in vain for some expression of disinterested kindness.

Speak to those while they can hear and be helped by you, for the day may come when all our expressions of love and appreciation may be unheard. Imagine yourself standing beside their last resting place. Think of the things you could have said of them, and to them, while they were yet living. Then go and tell them now.

Byron's Lament on Downfall of Greece

"For What Is Left the Poet Here?—For Greeks a Blush—for Greece a Tear."

The isles of Greece, the isles of Greece!
Where burning Sappho loved and sung.
Where grew the arts of war and peace.
Where Delos rose, and Phoebus sprung!
Eternal summer gilds them yet,
But all, except their sun, is set.

The Scian and the Teian muse,
The hero's heart, the lover's lute,
Have found the fame your shores refuse:
Their place of birth alone is mute
To sounds which echo further West
Than your sires' "Islands of the Blest."

The mountains look on Marathon—
And Marathon looks on the sea;
And musing there an hour alone,
I dream'd that Greece might still be free:
For standing on the Persian's grave,
I could not deem myself a slave.

A king sate on the rocky brow
Which looks o'er sea-born Salamis;
And ships, by thousands, lay below,
And men in nations—all were his!
He counted them at break of day—
And when the sun set where were they?

And where are they? and where art thou,
My country? On thy voiceless shore
The heroic lay is tuneless now—
The heroic bosom beats no more!
And must thy lyre, so long divine,
Degenerate into hands like mine?

'Tis something, in the dearth of fame,
Though link'd among a fetter'd race,
To feel at least a patriot's shame,
Even as I sing, suffuse my face,
For what is left the poet here?
For Greeks a blush—for Greece a tear.

—Lord Byron.

TOPICS OF INTEREST TO THE PLANTER

An Experiment With Geraniums.

I do not know of any plant which is mentioned in a florist's catalogue which so bravely endeavors to do its best under trying conditions as the geranium, writes A. Eva. No matter if the rain falls or there is an excess of damp weather for weeks, it continues to send forth its cheering brightness, and when hot wind and sun of drouth will or destroy some other plants, it yet more proudly lifts its glories in defiance.

The most lovely geranium of the single flowered class I have ever seen or seen is the "Julia Marlowe."

It is said (and easily believed) that one of the most exceptional novelties which is The flowers are and rounded as In color it is petals are broad and form a flower and one-half inches trusses are plant attracts

Another geran without scarlet border

This is one of the is extremely effective in masses. The flowers are very and held up by and resist both storm and heat.

No matter what the variety of geranium, I have learned that we must respect effects in accordance with the plant food which it receives.

Last year when transplanting the to the open ground, we made the rich with well rotted manure from cow stables. The plants made an exceedingly rapid growth, with leaves which were remarkable as to size and deep coloring, but throughout the summer the flowers were so sparse that our disappointment was great. For some reason florists seldom, or never refer to the proper balancing of plant foods when preparing soil for flowers, but I believe it is as necessary to success in this work as in the growing of fruits and grains.

The fruit grower and the farmer knows that nitrogen in too great amount will cause too rank a growth of leaf and stalk at the expense of fruit or grain, but if the nitrogen is properly balanced with the two other important elements of all plant food, viz., potash and phosphoric acid, the fruit and grain will be perfectly developed.

It was plainly evident that my geraniums were given an excess of nitrogen by fertilizing with the barn manure alone, which is quite often very deficient in either potash or phosphoric acids, scientists tell us, and so I decided this past spring to experiment.

Before transplanting the geranium we thoroughly mixed with the soil of the bed, which was eight by two feet, a round quart of high grade fertilizer such as we use for garden truck, which contains in 100 pounds of mixture four pounds of nitrogen, seven pounds of available phosphoric acid and nine pounds of actual potash in the sulphate form.

The result has been most satisfactory. The geranium leaves have not been abnormally large, as were those of last year, nor too greatly abundant, but the flower stems seem almost countless and the trusses are enormous and of great brilliancy of color.

Plants of the same variety, again given the treatment of last year, and proved as unsatisfactory. I think all flower growers will meet with better success in regard to profusion of flowers and intensity of color if they will mix some potash salt with the stable manure and soil, and I know the flowers are far more lasting than those grown with manure, without addition.

Lucerne on Sandy Soil.

J. P. Pearson—Could sandy land with yellow sand subsoil be made rich enough to grow lucerne? What time should it be sown for winter pasture? Would it injure cotton to run two furrows to the row at the last plowing of year and sow rye for winter pasture?

Answer—A sandy loam, made rich, is the very place for lucerne (alfalfa), such a location and crop as would produce a fine yield of corn or cane, or forty to fifty bushels of wheat would produce a satisfactory crop of clover. The proper time to sow the seeds is in September or October (after thoroughly preparing and fertilizing (manuring) the land, provided you have a good season in the fall sufficient to bring up the seed properly. If the seed lie in the ground until the winter rains set in and then come up the chances are that the young plants will be killed by the first hard frost. I advise you to sow in rows thirty inches apart, just as you would sow rutabaga turnips, so that the land can be tilled with cultivator or hoe. Lucerne is not so well adapted to sandy soil and certainly should not endurable. And often, even in the midst of wealth and luxury, there are those who listen and long in vain for some expression of disinterested kindness.

Speak to those while they can hear and be helped by you, for the day may come when all our expressions of love and appreciation may be unheard. Imagine yourself standing beside their last resting place. Think of the things you could have said of them, and to them, while they were yet living. Then go and tell them now.

Downfall of Greece

For standing on the Persian's grave,
I could not deem myself a slave.

A king sate on the rocky brow
Which looks o'er sea-born Salamis;
And ships, by thousands, lay below,
And men in nations—all were his!
He counted them at break of day—
And when the sun set where were they?

And where are they? and where art thou,
My country? On thy voiceless shore
The heroic lay is tuneless now—
The heroic bosom beats no more!
And must thy lyre, so long divine,
Degenerate into hands like mine?

'Tis something, in the dearth of fame,
Though link'd among a fetter'd race,
To feel at least a patriot's shame,
Even as I sing, suffuse my face;
For what is left the poet here?
For Greeks a blush—for Greece a tear.
—Lord Byron.

SOUTHERN FARM NOTES.

TOPICS OF INTEREST TO THE PLANTER, STOCKMAN AND TRUCK GROWER.

An Experiment With Geraniums.

I don't know of any plant which is mentioned in a florist's catalogue which so bravely endeavors to do its best under trying conditions as the geranium, writes A. Eva. No matter if the rain falls or there is an excess of damp weather for weeks, it continues to send forth its cheering brightness; and when hot wind and sun of drouth wilt or destroy some other plants, it yet more proudly lifts its glories in defiance.

The most lovely geranium of the single flowered class I have ever owned or seen is the "Julia Marlowe."

It is said (and easily believed) to be one of the most exceptionally valuable novelties which spring up in plant life. The flowers are as perfectly formed and rounded as though made of wax. In color it is a dazzling scarlet; the petals are broad and overlapping and form a flower which is fully two to two and one-half inches in diameter. The trusses are extremely large, and the plant attracts much attention.

Another geranium which I believe is without exception the most intense scarlet bedder known is "Le Soleil."

This is one of the double type and is extremely effective when planted in masses. The flowers are very large and held up by strong, straight stems, and resist both storm and heat.

No matter what the variety of geranium, I have learned that we must expect effects in accordance with the plant food which it receives.

Last year when transplanting them to the open ground, we made the soil rich with well rotted manure from the cow stables. The plants made an exceedingly rapid growth, with leaves which were remarkable as to size and deep coloring, but throughout the summer the flowers were so sparse that our disappointment was great. For some reason florists seldom, or never, refer to the proper balancing of plant foods when preparing soil for flowers, but I believe it fully as necessary to success in this work as in the growing of fruits and grains.

The fruit grower and the farmer knows that nitrogen in too great amount will cause too rank a growth of leaf and stalk at the expense of fruit or grain, but if the nitrogen is properly balanced with the two other important elements of all plant life, viz., potash and phosphoric acid, both fruit and grain will be perfectly developed.

It was plainly evident that my geraniums were given an excess of nitrogen by fertilizing with the barn manure alone, which is quite often very deficient in either potash or phosphoric acids, scientists tell us, and so I decided this past spring to experiment.

Before transplanting the geraniums, we thoroughly mixed with the soil of the bed, which was eight by two feet, a round quart of high grade fertilizer, such as we use for garden truck. This contains in 100 pounds of material, four pounds of nitrogen, seven pounds of available phosphoric acid and ten pounds of actual potash in the sulphate form.

The result has been most satisfactory. The geranium leaves have not been abnormally large, as were those of last year, nor too greatly abundant, but the flower stems seem almost countless and the trusses are enormous and of great brilliancy of color.

Plants of the same variety were again given the treatment of last year and proved as unsatisfactory. I think all flower growers will meet with better success in regard to profusion of flowers and intensity of color if they will mix some potash salt with the stable manure and soil, and I know the flowers are far more lasting than those grown with manure, without this addition.

Lucerne on Sandy Soil.

J. P. Pearson—Could sandy pine land with yellow sand subsoil be made rich enough to grow lucerne? What time should it be sown for winter pasture? Would it injure cotton to run one or two furrows to the row at this time of year and sow rye for winter pasture?

Answer—A sandy loam, made very rich, is the very place for lucerne (alfalfa), such a location and condition as would produce a fine yield of sugarcane, or forty to fifty bushels of corn, would produce a satisfactory growth of clover. The proper time to sow the seeds is in September or October, after thoroughly preparing and fertilizing (or manuring) the land, provided you can have a good season in the ground—sufficient to bring up the seed promptly. If the seed lie in the ground until the winter rains set in and then come up the chances are that the young plants will be killed by the first heavy frost. I advise you to sow in rows thirty inches apart, just as you would sow rutabaga turnips, so that the land can be tilled with cultivator or scrape. Lucerne is not so well adapted to grazing and certainly should not be pastured before it is in its third year, and then not heavily. It is particularly suited for green soiling and for hay. You may also sow the seeds in March or April.

It would not injure cotton in the least to sow in rye and cover in with two or three shallow furrows in one trip with a cultivator.—Professor Soule.

Establishing a Blue Grass Sod.

J. L. M. writes: How is the best way to get a good blue grass sod? What soils are most suitable for blue grass? What is the correct way to get the number of bushels of lime per acre?

It will take both time and patience and good farming to secure a good blue grass sod, some of the best sods I have ever seen being from twenty-five to 100 years old. Blue grass comes slowly and does not become well established for several years, but of course it will yield some grazing and continue to improve in quality if handled judiciously. Many persons make the mistake of not sowing blue grass at all, but rather wait for it to come naturally. This takes too much time, for one thing, and unless the conditions are very favorable the waiting may be in vain. On the other hand, many who sow blue grass attempt to graze it at the end of the first or second season and overstock the ground, with the result that the crowns of the grass are eaten down too closely and much of it dies, or at least it does not grow and spread as rapidly as it should and weeds come in and choke out what the cattle do not destroy.

Land intended for blue grass should be very carefully prepared and well enriched with farmyard manure, or if that is not available, a leguminous crop may be plowed under to advantage and supplemented with liberal applications of high-grade acid phosphate and potash, say at the rate of 200 pounds of the former and fifty pounds of the latter per acre. Be sure that the land is free from weeds. This may be accomplished by putting it in a hoed crop a year before seeding to grass and is probably a better and more satisfactory method than summer fallowing. Strong limestone soils are best suited to blue grass. It does not give good results as a rule on thin, light, leachy soils or very tenacious clays unless they are well underdrained. Blue grass loves lime, and where the underlying rocks are well supplied with this element, it generally provides satisfactory grazing when once well established. Dry, thin lands are not well adapted to this grass. This does not mean that it must of necessity be sown on low land, for blue grass in sections to which it is adapted does well on hilly, rolling land sufficiently porous to retain a good part of the water that falls on it as rain. It also gives its best results in semi-shaded pastures, as it does not like too strong open sunlight.

There are many ways of applying lime and it is hard to say which is the best. That depends a good deal on local conditions and on the lime used. There are many forms of lime sold on the markets which can be distributed in the grain drill to advantage. A special drill is also made for the application of lime. It is not an expensive implement and provides one of the easiest and most satisfactory ways of distributing a substance which is very mean to handle. Lime can be applied by buying it in the unslacked condition and distributing it at satisfactory distances over the field, depending on the amount to be applied per acre, scattering over the ground uniformly after it is slaked and incorporating in the soil with a harrow. The distance apart to place the piles of lime on an acre of land depends on the rate of application. For instance, if you put the lime approximately twenty-two feet apart in each direction and put half a bushel in each pile, you would be applying between fifty and sixty bushels per acre. If you put twenty-five bushels per acre, the distance of the piles would be twice as great, but twenty-five bushels is a light application. The ordinary grain drill will not apply lime in sufficient quantities for heavy applications unless it is especially constructed with that end in view. For ordinary farm practice lime can be distributed from the wagons in piles as sugested. Lime should be applied about two weeks before seeding, so that it will have no injurious effect on germination, and as a rule, it should be applied separately from any commercial fertilizer which may be used.—Andrew M. Soule, in Knoxville Journal and Tribune.

THE FLOWERS.

All the names I know from nurse:
Gardener's garters, Shepherd's purse,
Bachelor's buttons, Lady's smock,
And the Lady Hollyhock.

Fairy places, fairy things,
Fairy woods where the wild bee wings,
Tiny trees for tiny dames—
These must all be fairy names!

Tiny woods below whose boughs
Shady fairies weave a house;
Tiny tree-tops, rose or thyme,
Where the braver fairies climb!

Fair are grown-up people's trees,
But the fairest woods are these;
Where if I were not so tall,
I should live for good and all.
—R. L. Stevenson.

THE CUNNING CROW.

Once a chained-up watch-dog lay in front of his kennel lazily picking a bone. A hungry crow looked on with longing eyes, and hoped that by diverting the attention of the dog it might succeed in securing the bone for itself. So it came as close to the animal as it dared, and began to indulge in all sorts of ridiculous antics. The dog, however, took not the slightest notice.

Then the crow hurried off and fetched a friend, who seated himself on the bough of a tree just behind the kennel, while the first crow again danced before the dog. As the animal continued to remain absolutely indifferent, the crow friend flew into the air, suddenly swooped down, and struck the dog's spine a tremendous blow with its beak.

The dog started with surprise and pain, and, dropping the bone, made a fierce but unsuccessful grab at his assailant. Meanwhile the first crow snatched up the bone as quick as lightning, and flew off with it. The two conspirators then shared the stolen property between them.—Watchman.

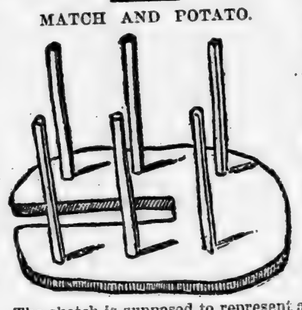
BIG CAT, LITTLE BELL.

William Baker's big Maltese cat, says a Peru correspondent of the Indianapolis News, created some excitement yesterday morning when it tolled the bell of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, on Flax Hill, a suburb of this city. The bell is about the size of an ordinary dinner bell, with a clipper that weighs less than a pound.

"Little Willie," as the cat is called, likes sparrows, and went hunting to the belfry of the little church yesterday morning about 4 o'clock. A sparrow must have been in the bell to start with, and when the cat made a jump for it the bell tolled.

The swinging clapper then attracted the attention of the cat more than did the sparrow, and "Little Willie" began to play with it. The bell sounded several times, and the people living near by peered through their windows to see what was happening. Some thought there was to be an early morning service, while others supposed that some one was in trouble. Mr. Baker investigated, and found his pet cat in the belfry playing with the bell clapper.

MATCH AND POTATO.



The sketch is supposed to represent a slice off a potato with six matches sticking in it.

The puzzle is to lay it flat on the table, and with a knife make two straight cuts, parting the potato in six pieces, having a match sticking up in each piece.—Philadelphia Record.

LOOKING FOR BIRDS.

What is the best place to look for birds? Why, every kind of place has its charm for different kinds of birds. Along the little streams or lakes you can find dainty sand pipers, green herons and phoebes. A kingfisher's rattling cry may catch your ear; you may even see him plunge headlong into the water and come out with a gleaming shiner in his big bill. In the marshes are the beautiful clear piping redwings and the chuckling marsh-wrens, and you may startle a big brown bittern. Along the roadways the vesper sparrows may fly ahead of you, showing their white tail feathers as they go.

The great thing to learn about birds, after you have come to know a number of kinds, are: First, that every kind does things in its own way; second, that they group themselves naturally into families as much by similar habits as by what scientific men call "character." Thus, flycatchers dart out and catch insects on the wing, with a snap of the bill, returning to their perch to wait for another victim. Sparrows like to be near or on the ground. Woodpeckers like to climb about in the trees, bracing on their stiff tails, head up. It has been ascertained that, in the main, birds like to follow valleys when they can, even going back for short distances to enter a valley that will lead them in their true direction. Many birds do not migrate at all, like the crows, chickadees and many hawks and woodpeckers; while others, like the red-poll linnets, snowflakes, crossbills and butcher birds, come to us only with very cold winters.—St. Nicholas.

HERO OF THE ALPS.

The old hero of the Alps, Leopold Grand, the Alpine guide of the Little St. Bernard, has just been decorated with the Order of the Legion of Honor. None deserved the distinction better than he, writes the Geneva correspondent of the London Express.

Grand lived in a tiny refuge hut on the Little St. Bernard, and has saved the lives of countless travelers who lost their way or were overcome by storms and avalanches while attempting to reach the St. Bernard Hospice.

In 1887 Grand saved the lives of five travelers who were lost in a snow hurricane. His reward for this act was a silver medal. In the following year he received the Order of Merit from the King of Italy for saving the lives of six Italians. In 1880 he rescued, single handed, Mme. de Verrage, a French lady, who had been swept away by an avalanche, and was rewarded by a gift of sixteen shillings.

Some years later Grand and his son went to the rescue of a detachment of Alpine troops that had been overcome by an avalanche. While toiling at the work of rescue Grand saw his son swept away before his eyes and dashed over a precipice.

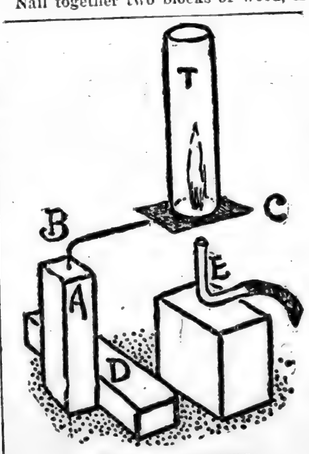
The poor old father, recognizing that his son was killed, said a prayer and went on with his work of rescuing the soldiers, and after digging them out of the snow he carried them one by one on his back to his hut, a distance of nearly a mile. He succeeded in saving the lives of three of these men, and received from the Government $20 as his reward.

Again, in 1900, he rescued a party of Alpine troops from death, and not a year has passed without the heroic old man saving one or more travelers at the risk of his life.

THE SINGING FLAMES.

Did you ever hear of "singing" qames? Here are two little experiments showing how sensitive a flame may be to sharp sounds, and how it may be made to "sing."

Nail together two blocks of wood, A



TO MAKE FLAMES SING.

and D, as shown in the picture, and at the top of A fasten a piece of wire, B, with a ring about five inches in diameter at its other end. Over this ring place a piece of wire gauze, C.

Get a piece of glass tubing about a quarter of an inch in its outside diameter, and have a jet made at one end, and also have it bent at right angles, as shown in the cut. It can then be fastened to the block of wood, E, with a little wax, so that its tip is about two inches under the gauze. To the other end of the glass tubing fasten a piece of rubber tubing, and connect it with a gas jet.

Turn on the gas and light it above the wire gauze, and it should burn there with a thin conical flame about four inches long. Let it burn a moment steadily, and then if you suddenly make a hissing sound the flame is so sensitive that it will shrink at once to a small blue flame.

Again let it burn up quietly, and then suddenly whistle, or clap your hands, or jingle some coins, or make a rapping noise. Again the flame will shrink, and it will act in the same way at any sudden, loud noise.

Now get a glass tube, T, if possible, twelve inches long and an inch and a quarter in diameter, but any size will do, from seven inches to two feet in length, and from three-quarters of an inch to an inch and a half in diameter.

Rest the tube lightly on the gauze, covering the flame with it. If now you will lift the gauze and the tube from the ring and raise them very gradually, the flame will shorten and then suddenly begin to "sing." Now lower the gauze and tube to just the point where the flame ceases to sing, and it will be so sensitive that the lightest high, sharp sound will set it to singing, but it will cease the moment the sound stops.

The flame responds very quickly, as you may prove by saying a word like "secede" or "sensitive." The flame will sing twice in each case, in the first word for the hissing of the s and c; in the second for each s.

Make these experiments; they are very curious and interesting.—Philadelphia Record.

Antiseptic From Straw.

Surgeon-General Kikuzi, of the Japanese army, has invented an inexpensive antiseptic surgical dressing which he prepares by burning straw in a room from which air has been excluded. The charcoal which results makes an excellent absorbent disinfectant and deodorizer. It is free from germs and remains sterile.

In Korea the rooms of a wife or mother are the sanctuary of any man who breaks the law. Unless for treason or for one other crime, he cannot be forced to leave those rooms, and so long as he remains under the protection of his wife's apartments he is secure from the officers of the law.

THE PRESIDENT'S LETTER.

After the president got to Birmingham it is said that he sent a letter to Clanton addressed to Judge L. H. Reynolds and W. A. Collier, of which the following is a purported copy. We have not seen the original. Mr. Roosevelt evidently appreciated that blooming galaxy of children:

COPY.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
WASHINGTON.

Birmingham, Alabama,
October 24, 1905.

Gentlemen:

I would like, if it is possible for you to do so, to express through you my appreciation to the people of the town of Clanton and especially to the school children who came out to greet me. I should so like to have stayed with you a little while and have said a few words to you, and nothing but the imperative necessity of keeping to my schedule prevented my doing so.

With hearty appreciation, believe me,

Sincerely yours,
THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

OCTOBER WEATHER.

We had all kinds of weather in October, according to the Clanton branch of the weather bureau. The warmest day was the 2d, when the thermometer registered 89 degrees; the coldest day was the 26, 57 degrees; the coldest night was 34 degrees on the 22d. The average high temperature for the month was about 74 degrees and the average low was about 53 degrees. There was rain on 12 days, the total rainfall being 4.38 inches, of which 1 1-2 inches fell in the 24 hours ending at 7 a.m. on the 10. There were light frosts on the 11-12-22; and a thunder storm on the 15.

SIXTH DIST. S. S. CONVENTION.

Which was held at Ebenezer church Oct. 29, was a grand success in every particular. Of the 14 schools in the District 13 were represented, which proves beyond all doubt that the people of our district are more interested in this work than ever before. Delegates from the following schools were present: Alpine, Cox's Chapel, Ebenezer, Mt. Carmel, Maplesville, Oden school house, Pilgrim's Rest, Pleasant Grove, Riderville, Sardis, Stanton Methodist, Stanton Presbyterian and Valley Creek, Antioch being the only one not represented.

The speakers of the day were Judge Joseph Carthil, state secretary; Revs. Robt. Jones, W. J. Ruddick, T. F. Davis and Messrs. W. B. Spear, T. G. Milling, G. W. Fox, N. L. Broadhead. A vast number of our superintendents and delegates made short talks and reports of their schools which were interesting and beneficial. The association voted to hold its next convention with Valley Creek church, and also voted to take up a collection for the expenses of the association, which was done, and $3.09 was raised for which we are thankful. The convention thanks the good people of Stanton and vicinity for the hospitality they showed toward us in taking care of the convention. Last, but not least, we thank our beloved friend and brother, Judge Carthel, for his visit to our convention and for the interesting and uplifting talks he made. If we will take heed to what we heard, it will be but a short time until our schools will be on a higher plane and our district a Banner District.

ANDREW B. DEASON,
Dist. Secretary.

Poet Laureate Austin declares that there have been no great women poets. This opens the way for the retort that there has been no great poet laureate since Tennyson.

THORSBY LETTER.

Mr. and Mrs. Roman went to Birmingham on last Wednesday to visit the latter's father and also to see the fair. Mr. Turnbium has taken a business trip to the north. The card party given by Miss Howard and Miss Ericson at the former's home was much enjoyed by the participants on last Wednesday night. Mr. Kile carried home the first prize and Mr. Jay Caverno received the booby prize. Mr. Amundson has returned from Chicago, where he had been looking after his business. T. T. Thorson has again returned to the north, where he is working in behalf of the Concordia Land and Improvement Association. Mrs. N. Flowers' grandson of Cottondale, Ala., was a visitor in Thorsby last week. Mrs. Ellifson entertained the Norwegian Ladies' Aid Society last week. The Stuckenburg and Anderson families have returned to Rockford, Ill. The S. S. Convention of Beat 9 was held at the Union S. S. on Sunday last. There were many good talks given by members on the program and good impromptu talks were given by others. The quartettes rendered during the programme were much enjoyed and the singing furnished by the Collins Chapel choir was much appreciated. Some of the Sunday schools either forgot or neglected to send delegates to the convention, which showed a lack of interest and enthusiasm on their part. The next convention is to be held at Collins Chapel on the fifth Sunday in December. Let each S. S. do its part in helping to make the convention a good one. Let beat 9 always come up to the standard. Prof. Von Fleitz, of Akron, Ohio, delivered a fine lecture at the Norwegian church on Sunday night. He will speak at the Swedish Lutheran church on the night of November 5th. Mr. and Mrs. Williams have returned to Indiana. They will be missed by many persons in and about Thorsby. Mr. McFarland and family have moved to Huntsville, Ala. Mr. McFarland intends to farm in that section of the country. The Carr family have moved into the home vacated by the Stuckenberg and Anderson families. Mr. Eckblad and family have moved into the bakery building. Carl Larson and family have moved into the home vacated by the Carr family, which the former have purchased. The many friends of Mr. and Mrs. Foss surprised them at their home on Monday night. A. Horn took a business trip to Montgomery on Tuesday. P. D. Wilson, of Clanton, was in town Tuesday. Mrs. J. Parnell has returned from Montgomery and we are glad to hear that her health is impriving. Messrs. Teddy Lefsted and Jay Caverno gave a party at the latter's home on Tuesday. Twenty-two of the young people of Thorsby were present and one and all thoroughly enjoyed the evening. The music rendered during the evening was much appreciated. Miss Nellie Malmquist went to Clanton on Wednesday. Miss Alma Hovey entertained her friends at the home of her aunt on Wednesday night. Though they were a little late for Hallowe'en they played games appropriate for that evening. All the girls and boys dressed in old costumes which helped to make the party a jolly affair. Dainty refreshments were served during the evening and the party was a marked success. From appearances Hallowe'en seemed to pass of rather quietly in Thorsby. Let us all turn out to cheer for our boys this coming Saturday when they play ball with the Jemison boys.

NEMO.

Clanton, Oct. 30, 1905.

Mr. Editor:

Here I come again, but I'm sort of in the fix that the fellow was who was hauling a load of apples up a hill, and when he got to the top of the hill and stopped his team to rest he found that the tail board of his wagon was loose and the apples had all lost out. He sat down and scratched his head and another fellow came along and knowing that this wagon man could do some pretty tall cussing, he asked him "Why don't you cuss?" and the old fellow said: "It's no use. I can't do this subject justice." I want to write about the president's reception and I feel like "I can't do the subject justice." Wasn't it a howling success? I'm so glad to see the democrats changing their views and coming over to the republican party so fast, but still I feel a little doubtful, for some of these democrats would be a drawback to any party. When I think of last year when Judge Adams was making a speech in the court house and he referred to Booker Washington and President Roosevelt's wife waltzing together, and pictured Booker sitting at the table with Mrs. Roosevelt on one side and her daughter on the other, and these democrats were cheering him, and I specially noticed some clapping their hands, who like to have run over themselves to get close to the president. Well, some one said "that wise men change," but don't you know I'm afraid if things go on like this that there'll not be enough democrats left to run a ticket next year. We've got a problem on our hands to know what to do with them. If it wasn't for us country folks we'd wonder what they were going to do with us, for this last crowd took charge of the meeting just as soon as they got in, but when we country Jakes get a shake at some of them we'll be inside the ropes." God bless the school children, didn't they look nice? I hear that the president wrote a letter back to Judge Reynolds, and said in it that he especially appreciated the presence of the school children. Say, I just can't understand how it was that nearly all the committees were democrats, and how it was that some men were pushing and taking the lead to get to the president, men who I'd have thought that if you'd asked them to serve on a committee to receive the president, that it would have insulted them. I thought some one must have fooled them pretty well, and I still think something slick has been done. How could the banner man be on a committee to receive a republican president after what he said about him in his paper last year? Just think of it! Col. A. C. Smith, second to no lawyer in town and secretary of the republican executive committee of Chilton county, and the editor of THE UNION, a republican so straight that nobody ever has to ask where he stands, neither of them were on any of the committees. Col. Smith was (so I'm told) at the first meeting when the committee of 9 were appointed, all democrats except Judge Reynolds. How did they ever put the Judge on? The good book says a little leaven will do a big work, but just think what a lump the judge had to work. It can't be said the democrats were put on to fill up, for there were plenty of republicans that would have been glad to participate in the reception of the president they had voted for who were left out. No, it must be that the democrats wanted to get the job and so get as near the man who has the handing out of federal offices. It looks like the democrats all over Alabama had a common understanding as to taking charge of the president; for at Birmingham at first there wasn't a republican on the committee, though they afterwards added a few, but Clanton takes the cake (or the trough). To cap the whole, after Judge Reynolds had worked this stop of the president up, had written several letters to him about it, and had made several trips to Birmingham and Montgomery to see about it, in fact did all that was done toward getting the president to recognize us, the judge was not selected to introduce him (though the highest officer in the county and a republican) but a leading democrat was. I'm just dumb founded, and just can't do the subject justice, though sometimes I think it was just a nice trap laid for the democrats and they walked right into it. When I get over the shock I may say some more on this theme. You all know it used to be said that when our fellows were elected and came to Clanton that they got hypnotized; but I think that the other fellows are getting it now. Old farmers, keep your powder dry and don't let these Clanton chaps flank you. I want to thank 'Squire Vanderveer for selecting as many of our folks on the police force that day, if it had not been for him we republicans would have been mighty scarce iside the ropes. And say, 'Squire, we've stood by you, and we know you are in sympathy with us, so cut loose and come straight over. And Col. Smith, never mind about the democrats slighting you. WE, THE PEOPLE, do the appointing that counts in this county. It is no drawback in Chilton to have certain men against you. What is this I hear about a strong stock company forming to put up a building and buy printing presses, etc., and make an abiding home for our paper, THE UNION? There is no fear of the present editor selling us out, but we'll all get together and buy the stock and keep our fingers on the trigger in the future.

Respectfully,
JUST A VOTER.

CALERA LETTER.

Mr. Editor:

We went to the fair at Birmingham last week, saw "Teddy" and that immense crowd of people that greeted him, but it was such a "jam" that we could not get close enough to hear him. What we saw of the fair was fairly good. The most interesting "side show" we visited was "Uncle Gipson," a former resident of Calera, who has lived in three centuries, claiming to be 117 years old, and his wife, who is about 90. This is probably the oldest living couple in the United States. Calera is still at the crossing, not much news but some "gossip" of which "the least said is the soonest mended." The high school is doing well and patrons seem pleased with the teachers. More anon.

VETERAN.

RANDOLPH.

Dear Union:

Again we appear before your readers. Glad we hear no complaining about "hard times." Even democrats admit that prosperity is here. Then why not let America remain under the administration of the republican party? It looks now like democracy has gone down to rise no more. The editorial in last Union was logical, conservative and timely. We allude to its concluding words. A goodly number of our people went to Birmingham last week and saw our president. They report a great time. The people know a good thing when they see it. The hearty reception given to our president proves it. Give the people a chance and they will not make many mistakes. We suppose among those who went from Randolph to the state fair last week none were more happy than the faithful and efficient colored porter at the Randolph hotel, Uncle George Lawrence. He spent two or three days there, saw the president and reports a great time. He is a true type of the old negro, the number of whom is growing very small. R. M. Hubbard was in town Sunday. Joe Jones came down from Sylacauga Saturday night. Sam Brantley, assistant operator at Ashby, was a pleasant visitor recently. Mrs. Tarrant, of Birmingham, has charge of the school here. Mrs. Lucia Sellers, of Tuscaloosa county, was among her friends here Monday. Miss Pearl Meroney went to Birmingham last week. These are busy days. Cotton is pouring in. John F. Armstrong has gone to north Alabama home seeking. John S. Waldrup went to Birmingham last week. Your correspondent had the pleasure of visiting Rocky Mount on the 22nd. The congregation was immense. Mr. J. L. Brasher did most of the preaching. His sermons were plain and pointed and highly interesting. Among the visitors we were pleased to meet our esteemed Judge Reynolds. All around us autumn is doing its work. The weather grows more chilly. The leaves are falling. The falling leaf is a whisper to man. It whispers to young men and women to seek higher things and not procrastinate. It whispers to the old to be in haste and get all their duties performed and not procrasinate. A new coat of paint is being put on the depot. Mrs. Helton, of Fenwood, visited Mrs. Z. J. Jones Monday. W. H. Mahan and family have moved back into town from their home in beat 2. Mr. Dock Mahan, of Oakley, visited his daughter, Mrs. V. L. Hubbard, last week. Mrs. Darthulia Gibson, of Thorsby, and Miss Claude Rasberry, of Hubbard, were in town last week. Subscribe for the Union and get the news.

"ONE OF THE BOYS."

Clanton, Oct. 26, '05.

Editor Union:

Today is rainy and I've been thinking of yesterday's show, and the nice arrangements for the salutation and welcome of Theodore Roosevelt, republican president, so I'v edecided to write about what I saw. Mr. Editor, as I got into town I saw the decorations and everybody was talking about the president. Some fellows said "he stayed last night at Tuskegee with Booker T." and that "this town is not a republican town." Another one pointed to the nice decorations and said "that looks like it," and then he said "I'll show you," so he ran and got the list of committees on arrangements and we beheld all on the list except Judge Reynolds were democrats. I wasn't much surprised, for they always make for the trough and get all four feet in it. Oh, how nice the rope stretched around the crossing. I was wondering what would come next, and then I saw men coming, two and two, with police badges pinned on their coast, and they came on in led by Mr. Vanderver and were placed all round inside the rope. Then I saw some little groups coming bearing their flags, and they came in and placed themselves right beside the railroad tracks. This looked to me like a special crowd, and I wondered who was there to represent us farmers, but all the farmers I saw who weren't police, were on the outside of the rope. But those school children certainly did look beautiful. Then some one said "he's coming," and the train ran up and everybody stretched their necks to see THE MAN, and on the rear end there was the MAN. All saw he was not a negro, and Mr. Collier handed him a bouquet and THE BOSS thanked him, and went right on. I looked at those groups and say, if ever I saw "hacked" men they were the worst. My eyes caught onto Mr. Will Callen and even he looked "hacked." I'm a little mad with the president, but, Mr. Editor, I can't help it. Just think of the trouble and expense all those democrats went to to receive a republican president and then he goes right on through without stopping to thank them and show his appreciation. I don't think they'd vote for him now, and I can hardly blame them, after swallowing what they've said in the past and then to be treated that way. I had my foot over the rope.

Capitol Cleaned Up.

When the Senators and Representatives return to Washington, D. C., to attend the approaching session of Congress they will be astonished at the transformation in the Capitol. There has been a general cleaning up and various changes for the better have been made.

B. Frank Clyde, a wealthy steamship owner, was killed by a railway train in Philadelphia, Pa.

Burlington, Vt.—Seventeen girls, whose ages range from 2 to 6 years, at the St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum, in this city, were taken suddenly ill, and three of them died within three hours. At an autopsy held under the auspices of the state board it was determined that the death of the three girls was due to poisoning, but that the cause had not appeared.

SOUTHERN COTTON ASSOCIATION

Chilton Co. Sub-Division.

To Farmers, Landlords and Tenants:

At the meeting of the executive committee of the S. C. A. at Asheville, N. C., the assessment on every bale of cotton grown by members was placed at 3 cents.

At a meeting of the Chilton Co. association the county ex. committee was empowered to enforce this assessment.

The amount is small, and it is hoped that those even not members will co-operate in raising it.

The association has already added millions to the wealth of our country and the price of cotton would likely now rule at 8 cents but for it. The public ginneries are authorized to collect this 3 cents per bale.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is hit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

THE PULPIT.

A BRILLIANT SUNDAY SERMON BY THE REV. DR. H. ALLEN TUPPER.

Subject: Marriage and Divorce.

New York City.—Dr. H. Allen Tupper, pastor of the Fifteenth Street Baptist Church, preached Sunday on "Marriage and Divorce." The text was Matthew xix:4-6: "And He answered and said unto them: Have ye not read that He which made them at the beginning made them male and female, and said for this cause shall a man leave father and mother and shall cleave to his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh? What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." Dr. Tupper said:

Marriage was the first institutional gift of God to man; and the family was the first organization formed by God for the blessing of humanity. During all the centuries, amid the changes of governments, ceremonies and dispensations, the impress of divine favor rested upon these heaven-born establishments, and when their integrity has been maintained they have been the sources and centres of light and love; but when their integrity has been assailed untold sorrows and suffering have come upon mankind.

Christ wrought the beginning of His miracles at a marriage feast, in a gathering of families; and the pen of inspiration pictures Him as the Bridegroom and His Church as the Bride. The holy ordinance of marriage was given to support social order; to increase human happiness, and to provide that through well regulated families truth and righteousness might be transmitted from age to age. The violation of its vows is the canker at the heart of human progress and civilization. In the West Indies, we are told, there is a timber that has all the appearance of strength and solidity, but when the test is applied it snaps asunder and a fine white powder fills the air. The cause is now apparent; a worm has eaten its way into the heart of the wood and slowly but surely devoured its fiber until a hollow shell only remains.

The divorce evil, if not arrested, will gradually undermine our proud civilization, and when the testing time comes what appeared to be so attractive will prove to be only a hollow sham.

In the discussion of marriage and divorce I will call your attention to a divine law, a social disease and a fatal danger.

First—A divine law. Centuries ago the cunning Pharisees attempted to entrap the divine Teacher by asking Him the question: "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?" In that day there existed two opposing schools. At the head of one was Shammai, who insisted that divorce should be allowed only in the case of adultery; at the head of the other was Hillel, who maintained that a man might put away his wife for any cause at all. The tempters of Christ thought that the trap was well set, for if He failed to hold strict views on the marriage question they would report Him to the followers of Shammai, and if He held the opposite opinion they would turn upon Him the enmity of the followers of Hillel, one of whose strong adherents was Herod, who had just beheaded John the Baptist. In the words of another: "Brushing aside their quibbling, Jesus goes back to foundation principles and gives His message to the church of all ages concerning marriage and divorce."

It is a fivefold message: The marriage of one man and one woman is a divine institution; it is a divine act; it joins husband and wife in a relation closer and more binding than the relation of parent and child; it so unifies husband and wife that they cease to be two and become one flesh; and it can be dissolved only by death. When the point was made by the Pharisees that Moses maintained that a writing of divorcement shall be given under certain conditions, Jesus declared that this was a concession to the hardness of heart of the people.

The position of Jesus Christ on the subject under discussion is clearly set forth in His Sermon on the Mount: "It has been said, 'Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement, but I say unto you that whosoever shall put away his wife saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery.' And Mark records these words of Jesus: "Whosoever putteth away his wife and marrieth another committeth adultery against her. And if a woman shall put away her husband and be married to another, she committeth adultery." And in Luke we have set forth the same law of Christ. From His recorded words we are forced to the following conclusions: That Jesus allowed divorce on one and only one ground, namely, adultery, and that He seems to allow the re-marriage of the innocent party.

In Ephesians v:22-28 Paul gives the noblest picture of the sanctity and dignity of the marriage relation, for he compares it to the mystic union between Christ and the glorious church of the redeemed for whom Christ died. This is no temporary bond to be snapped at will. Jesus is to-day the Head of His Church, and it is being purified by Him, and made without spot or wrinkle. Moreover, in Romans vii:1-6 Paul argues that the Christian is set free from the bondage of the law, as the woman can have a new husband only on the death of the former husband. But in I Corinthians vii:12-16 Paul speaks of the problem in family life presented where the husband is a Christian and the wife a heathen and vice versa. He has two things to say about this new problem that had not arisen when Jesus spoke on the subject. 'His first word is that the Christian must not force a separation. If the heathen husband or wife is willing to continue the union, the Christian must be willing to do so. The marriage is legitimate and the children are legitimate. But the other word is this: Suppose the heathen husband or wife is not willing to keep up the marriage relation and insists on separation, then what? Well, let the unbelieving husband or wife go, says Paul. He uses the word "depart" here, not the technical word "put away."

It would seem that this is a case of voluntary separation, not a legal divorce. If this be true, there could, of course, be no re-marriage in such cases, for the marriage has never been legally annulled. This alternative is not even raised by Paul in this connection. It may be properly said, then, that Paul did not advocate divorce for anything save adultery, though he does not even indicate this exception save by implication.

This divine law is set forth in no uncertain sound on the pages of God's Word; and the disobedience of it must entail sorrowful results to the individual, the family, and the community.

Second—A social disease. Divorces are more numerous in the United States in proportion to marriages than in any other country of which we have any record. This social disease is contagious and spreading. In 1870, 3.5 per cent. of marriages ended in divorce. In 1880, 4.8 per cent. In 1890, 6.2 per cent. In 1900, 8.1 per cent. In 1890 the percentage of the divorced to the married was 0.5. In 1900 it was 0.7. According to the census of 1900 there were 2457 divorced women in the United States under the age of twenty, and 13,175 divorced women between twenty and twenty-five years of age.

South Carolina is the only State in the Union which grants no divorce.

New York is the only State in the Union which proposes to grant divorces only on Scriptural grounds; yet New York grants, annually, more than a thousand divorces.

Illinois gives a fair illustration of the laws of almost all the States. After reciting a long list of grounds upon which a divorce may be granted, the law concludes by empowering the court to grant a divorce upon any plea which it thinks justifiable.

The Western States, in order to increase their population, are making open and shameless bids for those dissatisfied with the married state to come to them and have it dissolved.

Statistics given by the Chicago Daily News Almanac, 1903, show the following number of divorces granted in leading cities of our country in 1901:

Providence, 327; Cincinnati, 405; Boston, 406; Cleveland, 454; Philadelphia, 492; St. Louis, 573; New York, 817; San Francisco, 846; Chicago, 1808.

The statistics of Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, for twenty years, from 1867 to 1886, show 328,712 divorces granted in the United States in those years. In 1867, 9937 divorces were granted, while in 1886 25,535 divorces were granted, making an increase of 157 per cent. The increase of population was sixty per cent. during the same period.

In 1867 Ohio granted 901 divorces, and in 1900 the State granted 3217 divorces—one to every eleven marriages solemnized in the State. Indiana granted, in 1867, 1096 divorces, and in 1900, 4599—one divorce to every six marriages solemnized in the State. Only a short time ago the papers were telling of a woman in Indiana who had eight living husbands, from whom she had been divorced, and this same woman was then preparing to be married to the ninth victim. Michigan in 1867 granted 449 divorces, and in 1900 granted 2418 divorces—one divorce to every eleven marriages solemnized in the State.

A table of divorces in the Christian world in 1885, as given in "Studies in History, Economics and Public Law," issued by Columbia University, gives the following interesting fact: Canada, Great Britain and Ireland, France, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Germany, Austria, Roumania, Russia and Australia granted a total of 20,111 divorces, while in the same year the United States granted 23,472 divorces—an excess over all other countries in the Christian world of 3361.

Forty-five States and several Territories have various and conflicting laws, and more than 3000 courts have jurisdiction of divorce cases. A learned essayist says of our legislation that it "presents the largest and strangest,and perhaps the saddest experiment in the sphere of family laws which free, self-governing countries have ever tried." It was published in a recent journal that divorces were granted in Chicago for the following causes: Snoring, cold feet, eating with a knife, insisting upon going to bed in his overcoat and boots, smoking cigarettes, failure as a cook.

During recent years divorce has developed into an industry in the United States, the legal profession and the bench have done much to encourage this terrible traffic.

For 6211 divorces in France in a given period, the United States offers 25,000, the United Kingdom showing 475 and the German Empire 6078 for the same time. For a period of twenty years in Maryland the rate of marriage to divorce was 61.94. Massachusetts averaged 31.28 to every divorce.

Some of the popular theories are that divorce is due to the conflicting and inharmonious statutes of various States. Thus as Colonel Wright, in his report, informs us, it is the belief that persons residing in the State of New York, where the law is strict, are in the habit of seeking divorces in Rhode Island. But the statistics show that of 4462 divorces granted in Rhode Island only ninety-seven were to parties married in New York, and of 6020 granted in Pennsylvania, only 765 were to parties married in New York, while of the 289,546 couples whose place of marriage was ascertained, 231,867 were divorced in the same State in which they had been married.

Third—A fatal danger. The attack upon the integrity of the family is an unmitigated evil and a crime against social order, which can only result in the destruction of all that is purest, noblest and best in the world. Here we find the secret cause of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire. The laws as to family life were loose; divorce became epidemic, and the empire went down in ruin and disgrace. The Reign of Terror in France followed the establishment of a law that marriage could be dissolved merely by application; 20,000 divorces were granted in Paris in one year, and during the same period 48,000 outcast children were carried into foundling hospitals and nearly 10,000 new-born babies were taken out of the sewers of the city and from the secret places by the police. The indescribable horrors of those times it is impossible to picture, and who will say that directly or indirectly the violation of the sanctity of the marriage state and the purity of the family life did not contribute largely toward those days of terror? The rejection of the Bible, the denial of God and the desecration of the home yielded bitter fruit, the taste of which still lingers in the mouth of France, and lessons written in blood have never been forgotten.

To-day in that country it is allowable to obtain separation for five years, and at the end of that time to apply for the conversion of the separation into absolute divorce if the parties have not been reconciled.

The practical results of the imperial divorce law in Germany have been gratifying. It gives four grounds for divorce—namely, adultery, attempt of either husband or wife on the life of the other; malicious, willful desertion and continued violation of the marriage vows. Both in France and Germany attempts are being made to escape threatening dangers by the enforcement of stricter laws on marriage and divorce.

In New England and Wales there were 176 divorces in 1870; 336 in 1890; 364 in 1900, and 727 in 1889; and the growing evil is at last attracting the attention of the lawmakers. We do not recognize the family at all in our national constitution. It appears in our State laws only as an object of some care, but not as an element of political power. Mr. Gladstone declared that his fear for our future centered very largely upon our ability to protect the family, for weakness here means disaster everywhere.

Realizing the perilous position in which we are placed by the increasing social evils resulting from divorces, a number of public spirited men initiated a corrective movement in 1878, and what is now known as the National League for the Protection of the Family, founded upon a broad basis, was organized in 1881. The results from this and kindred organizations have been marked and encouraging. Radical improvements are noticed in the laws of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin; divorces after residence of only three or six months are no longer permitted, as they formerly were, in North Dakota, Georgia, California and several Territories. All causes for divorce but one have been stricken from the laws of the District of Columbia, and commissions on uniformity by co-operation of the States now exist in no less than thirty-four States and Territories.

The question of a constitutional amendment and admission of a national law on the matter under discussion have been agitated; but as long as twelve States can be rallied in defense of the maintenance of State rights, it is a waste of time to attempt the amendments on marriage or divorce. But the agitation against this evil goes on as never before. The pulpit, the press, the platform, the schools, colleges and universities are awakening to a sense of the moral and social danger that threatens us, and the outspoken discussion of the marriage relation and the divorce laws must result in great good.

Thirty years ago none of our higher educational institutions gave any attention to the study of the family, but now the theological seminaries, the law schools and the universities are giving special care to this most important subject. We may be assured that our boasted civilization, our proud commercial greatness, our high educational attainments and our brilliant material developments will only hasten the day of our disaster unless we protect the family and honor the God of the home, who is the Father of us all.

An Infidel's Sermon to a Preacher.

Never shall I forget the remark of a learned legal friend who was at one time somewhat skeptical in his views. Said he to me:

"Did I believe, as you do, that the masses of our race are perishing in sin, I could have no rest. I would fly to tell them of salvation. I would labor day and night. I would speak with all the pathos I could summon. I would warn and expostulate and entreat my fellowmen to turn to Christ, and receive salvation at His hands. I am astonished at the manner in which the majority of you ministers tell your message. Why, you do not act as if you believed your own words. You have not the earnestness in preaching that we lawyers have in pleading. If we were as tame as you are, we would never carry a single suit."

A decade of years has passed away since that remark was made. I bless God it was addressed to me. It put fire into my bones which I hope will burn as long as I live. God preached a stirring sermon to me that day by the mouth of that infidel lawyer.—Peter Stryker.

Life is Constructive.

A certain evangelist is using a card on one side of which is the question, "What must I do to be saved?" and following it are the Scriptures which point out the way of salvation. On the other side of the card is the question, "What must I do to be lost?" and the answer follows, "Nothing."

The reply is simple but wonderfully impressive. Many think that in order to be lost they must run the log gamut of vices and be aggressively bad. Not so. We are all bad enough to miss the kingdom in spite of the good points we may have.

Life is an active, constructive force. It is likened unto a living temple or unto a vine. It must therefore be built up, and unless there is activity there is no building. Unless there is active goodness there is no character, and unless there is character there is no salvation.—Brethren Evangelist.

Spiritual Poverty.

Professing Christians sometimes attribute their spiritual poverty to nature. One is penurious, another cowardly, and they say it is because they have been less generously endowed by nature than others and cannot help it. It would be quite as reasonable for one whose father's table, to which he has free access, is daily loaded with wholesome food, to go about the streets with gaunt, bony fingers and ghastly countenance, starving to death, and saying, "I cannot help it." God is able to make a penurious man liberal, generous and benevolent, or a cruel man as gentle as a lamb, or a passionate man as calm and serene as the bosom of a mountain lake when the winds are hushed to rest. He is able to make all grace abound toward all His children.—Christian Advocate.

Learning What Life Is.

Sorrow is not an incident occurring now and then. It is the woof which is woven into the warp of life, and he who has not discerned the divine sacredness of sorrow and the profound meaning which is concealed in pain has yet to learn what life is.—F. W. Robertson.

Wireless Telegraphy Made Plain.

If you take hold of a swing rope and give it one vigorous shake, you will notice that the vibrations or movements that you have started follow along the rope clear to the end. If you toss a stone into a pond of still water you know that a ripple or wave will start from the place where the stone fell and spread in all directions to the very edge of the water. These vibrations or waves can be started in the air just as in the water, though you cannot see them and seldom feel them. Whenever you speak or sing or whistle you produce waves or vibrations that go to your ears and to the ears of those near you, where they cause a movement of the ear drum; this we call hearing.

If the water into which you throw the stone is not smooth, you know that the waves or ripples do not go far, but soon become lost in the other waves caused by the wind or by the current of the water. So it is with the waves of the air; the wind currents and the many voices cause so many other waves that the vibrations produced by your voice do not go far. If there was no other movement of the air when you speak you might be heard around the world. To keep out some of the waves that interfer with those made by your voice, you can speak through a pipe or speaking tube and your voice will be heard at a much greater distance.

Now, in all the space around us there is something else besides air. There is a very powerful something that we call electricity; it is wherever we look, though we cannot see it. It is in the air, all about us, is always in motion, and is constantly vibrating so fast that a wave has gone a thousand miles before you can think of it. Under certain conditions electricity has a special fondness for metals, and will follow a wire from one end to the other almost instantly, no matter how long the wire may be. So we have the telegraph and the telephone, which send waves of electricity over a wire hundreds of miles.

When we speak into the mouthpiece of a telephone, we divide the current or stream of electricity on the wire into little waves. At the end of the wire these same waves cause the same kind of vibrations that we made in speaking, and these vibrations produce a sound in the air like the sound of our voices. Now, remember the space all about us is full of this wonderful electricity, and you can readily see that waves are not really needed to carry it. The electricity is there already, and all we need to do is to divide it up into the right kind of waves, and then to provide some sort of arrangement at a distance that these waves will act upon, as the waves on the wire act upon the telephone or telegraph instrument.

If two separate wires are put on posts at some distance apart, and a strong current of electricity is sent through one of them, it has been discovered that there will be a similar current of electricity in the other wire also, though they are in no way connected. If the current of electricity on the one wire be divided up into little waves by the telephone or telegraph instrument, the same waves will be found on the other wire as well, and then we have wireless telephony or telegraphy on a small scale. We say "on a small scale," because there is a limit to the distance for which this method is available with the ordinary currents of electricity and with ordinary means of producing electrical waves. Still, the general principle is much the same.

These facts, and indeed all that are necessary to a perfect wireless system of telegraphy, have been known to scientists for many years; but it remained for a young Italian to put the knowledge of the wise men of science to practical and commercial use.

The work of Marconi has been to invent instruments that will produce waves strong enough and of the right kind to go across the ocean of electricity that surrounds us, and the other instruments to catch the waves so sent and turn them into dots and dashes.

Stations have been established at various points of high land and wires placed upon tall masts, from which messages may be sent in all directions. Companies have been organized to operate wireless systems, and the new method is gradually coming into popular use for the transaction of ordinary business.

The Government of the United States has adopted this form of telegraphy for its coast life-saving stations, for battleships, and for use in the army. The Russian, French, English and German governments have also adopted it in their navies and armies.

While much has been written about Marconi, and while we seldom think about wireless telegraphy without thinking of Marconi, many other people have been interested and have invented instruments that may prove better than his.

The uses to which wireless telegraphy may be put are many and varied. Ships may communicate with each other at sea or with stations on shore; life-saving stations may communicate with wrecked ships or with each other, powder mines may be fired, and torpedoes steered and exploded without danger to the operator. The wireless system may be applied to any use that now employs the telephone or telegraph, and to many uses where they would be of no value.

A curious instance of what may be done with wireless telegraphy occurred not long ago, and was reported by New York newspapers.

"Click, clickety-click!" ticked the Marconi instrument on the Red Star liner Finland, outward bound. This was the substance of the message heard by the operator:

"Hold up! Where are you going with those diamonds? Tell the purser to get the package of jewels out of his safe. A tug is coming after you, and the proper person is on board to whom the diamonds can be delivered. Don't sail until property is surrendered."

Only a wireless message could have stopped the big ship this side of Antwerp. But when the Marconigram was completed there was a bustle aboard ship.

Bells tinkled in the engine room, and, as the propellers ceased to revolve, the Finland lost headway.

The package of diamonds had been consigned to Hoey, Gascoigne & Scardefield, a custom house brokerage firm, by a client whose name they declined to make public.

The jewels arrived on Wednesday and were locked up in the liner's safe. The usual permits for immediate delivery to the official truckman of the public stores had been secured by the brokers, but, when the truckman called for the package, the purser was absent.

The brokerage firm did not learn until half an hour after the Finland sailed that the diamonds were on their way back to Antwerp. Red Star officials were called up on the telephone and told of the situation.

"That's all right; we'll get them for you," was the answer.

A few minutes later a tug swung out into the river and puffed full speed down the Narrows. Meantime a message was sent to the Marconi station and flashed to the Finland, which was held up off Sandy Hook.

Then the tug caught up with the liner and the diamonds were transferred. They were delivered to the brokers at 4 o'clock.—Frank H. Sweet, in S. S. Visitor.

CLEVER NEWS GATHERING

How the Associated Press Got the News of the New Pope's Election.

There came the conclave for the election of a new Pope. It was to be secret, and every effort was made to prevent its proceedings from becoming public. A brick wall was constructed about the hall to prevent anyone having access to it. But, to the amazement of every one, the Associated Press had a daily report of all that happened. One of the members of the noble guard was an Associated Press man. Knowing the devotion of the average Italian for the dove, he took with him into the conclave chamber his pet dove, which was a homing pigeon trained to go to our office. But Cardinal Rampolla could not be deceived—he ordered the pigeon killed.

Other plans, however, were more successful. Laundry lists sent out with the soiled linen of a cardinal and a physician's prescriptions sent to a pharmacy, proved to be the code messages which were deciphered in our office. We were enabled not only to give a complete and accurate story of the happenings within the conclave chamber, but we announced the election of the new Pope, which occurred about 11 a. m. in Rome, so promptly that, owing to the difference in time, it was printed in the morning papers of San Francisco of that day. We were also enabled to send the announcement back to Europe before it was received from Rome direct, and it was our message that was printed in all the European capitals. The Italian authorities did not interfere with these messages. —From Melville E. Stone's "The Associated Press," in the Century.

The Swiss Guard.

The Pope's Swiss Guard is preparing to celebrate in a fitting manner the four hundredth anniversay of its existence. The first convention for the rescruiting of Swiss mercenaries for the Papal service was concluded with Julius II. in 1505, but the fortunes of those who enlisted were unhappy. The Constable de Bourbon massacred them to a man when he sacked the Eternal City, finding them barricaded in St. Peter's Church. The next convention was concluded twenty-one years later. There have been two interruptions in the service of the mercenaries in consequence of the French occupations of 1798 and 1809; but the Guards expelled on that occasion returned with Pius VII, and have never since been obliged to leave the Vatican. They are the only organized mercenaries which Switzerland, once so famous for its mercenaries, now supplies.—Westminster Gazette.

The Empress of Japan.

The Empress of Japan is a noble and inspiring character. Her name is Haruko, and she is the daughter of a noble of the highest rank. She is two years older than the Mikado. Her marriage took place in 1868. A further indication of the sacredness in which the imperial personages are held is shown by the incident which occurred when it was determined that the court ladies should adopt European dress. At this time great difficulty was experienced in getting clothes to fit Her Royal Highness. The profane hands of a dressmaker could not be allowed to touch the personage of the Empress, so a court lady had to pose as a model until the garments were gradually made to fit.—Chicago News.

LITERARY SCRAPS AND PATCHES

Repose, Dignity, Reflection and Self-esteem a Need of Modern Writers.

The ideals of modern American publishing—books, magazines and newspapers—are so widely different from the ideals of a century or so ago that they are worthy some consideration in psychological data. The first notes sounded are those of terseness, inability, evanescence. The horizon of ideas and of news is widened.

The mind must pass quickly from one subject to another. Newspapers no longer cling to the long, well-thought out editorial meting out judgments. The editorial is now a few pithy comments upon events, and the shorter and smarter the better. Magazine articles follow the lead, and, except in a few magazines so well established that they can publish whatever they please, the articles become shorter and slighter, more smartly dressed up, but covering a less vigorous body of thought beneath. The modern novel has followed the lead, and is of lighter structure than the novel of a century ago.

All this condition in literature seems to have been brought about by our national doctrine of hustling. To do things to do quickly is our distinguishing characteristic, but the higher and finer productions are of slow growth.

We shall only produce worthily in this country when the present [illegible] and easy production theory is [illegible] when the commercial aspect of [illegible] that is infinitely superior to commerce is ignored, and when writers acquire in a dignified withdrawal from the [illegible] for popularity. Repose, dignity, reflection, individuality and self-esteem are the crying needs of modern writers. And as the ideals offered the nation come higher, the character of the [illegible] tion will be raised with the ideals.—Harper's Weekly.

The president of the trust, in an affable after-luncheon mood, stopped to converse with old George, a stableman.

"Well, George, how goes it?" he said, taking a dollar cigar from his pocket.

"Fair to middlin', sir," George answered. "Fair to middlin'."

And he continued to curry-comb the bay horse, while the president smoked and looked on in good humored silence.

"Me and this here hoss," George said suddenly, "has worked for your father sixteen year."

"Well, well," said the president, thinking a little guiltily of George's seven-dollar salary. "And I suppose you are both pretty highly valued, George, eh?"

"H'm," said George. "The boss was took sick last week, and [illegible] got a doctor for the hoss, but they docked my pay."—New York Press.

Bridal at a French Watering Place.

The season at one of the French watering places has ended in a dreadful scandal. One morning the sands at low water were found to be inscribed with a series of libelous statements about the most prominent visitors. The flirtations of this lady, the changing tints of that lady's hair, the charms of a third lady's bathing costume, the matrimonial prospects of a certain young lieutenant, were all written in sand with great candor. Next day there was a second series, and so the budget continued despite the efforts to detect the culprit. A watch was set, but the watchers must have slept, for in the morning, when visitors took their promenade, there followed the more horrid warnings to the sea-side Belshazzars. In the end those implicated persons took themselves off, saying they would never return.

Prisoners Prefer Jail.

In some parts of Siam girls who reach a certain age without marrying are placed in a privileged class, under the care of the king, who binds himself to find husbands for them all. Whether he is already married or not is of no consequence, for in Siam a man is not restricted to one wife; but still many prisoners prefer the jail.

REBATE EVIL IS "SCOTCHED."

Fining of Beef Packers Has Modifying Effect on Agitation for Rate Regulation.

Washington, October 24.—The conviction and fining of four members of the firm of Schwarzschild & Sulzberger last week, for accepting rebates, forms the chief topic of discussion here among the returning politicians. Praise for the president and the department of justice is coming in from all over the country. It appears to be the general opinion that the rebate evil is effectively scotched. A successful precedent has been established in rebate cases, and hereafter, it is alleged, the government's path will be comparatively easy in obtaining similar convictions if future cases of this kind arise.

The general belief as to the result of the fining of the packers is optimistic. The current opinion holds that it will have an immediate and lasting effect in curbing those large shippers who demand discriminations in their favor from the railroads. If the government is on the alert to enforce the law and the large shippers will be fined $25,000 whenever they are discovered accepting rebates, the rebate will soon become as defunct as the great auk. And rapacious shippers will be further impressed by the fact that there is every reason to believe that the government will not be satisfied by the payment of a fine for a second offense.

The belief grows that the decision of the United States district court in Chicago will have a great effect in modifying the demands of those who are agitating for rate regulation. Conservative opinion in Washington regards the conviction of the packers as an effective demonstration of the contention that existing legislation is competent to deal with unjust rate discriminations and as supporting the view that there is plenty of law on the statute books, if the government will only see to its enforcement. Those who opposed additional railroad legislation before the senate committee on interstate commerce at its special session last spring are pointing to the fact that they reiterated over and over again that existing laws, actively enforced, are adequate and are saying "I told you so."

"My little daughter was a mass of sores all over her body. Her face was being eaten away, and her ears looked as if they would drop off. I had three doctors, but she grew worse. Neighbors advised Cuticura, and before I had used half of the cake of soap and box of ointment the sores had all healed, and my little one's skin was as clear as a new born babe's. I would not be without Cuticura if it cost five dollars, instead of 75 cents, which is all it cost us to cure our baby. Mrs. G. J. Steese, 701 Coburn St., Akron, Ohio."

The White House Whiskey.

Good judges of liquor agree that White House whiskey during the Roosevelt residence there has been of uniformly good quality. Tradition has it that James Buchanan kept the best liquor ever seen in the executive mansion. It is said he had in his cellar at Wheatland enormous quantities of the best rye whiskey in the world when he died. It is said, and the story used to be told with the precision and circumstantiality that gave it the impress of truth, that whiskey—that is, good whiskey and such whiskey as he drank—had no other intoxicant effect on James Buchanan than a gentle exhilaration and that he could drink a gallon of it a day without perceptible effect on his physique or the slightest disorder of his mind.

When Feet Grow Larger.

Toward the end of the day the feet are at their maximum size, since activity and standing tend to enlarge the feet. If this rule were only borne in mind there would not be so many cases of shoes, when worn, being too tight, which at fitting appeared to be comfortable.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR NOVEMBER 5.

Subject: Esther Pleading For Her People, Esth. iv., 10 to v., 3—Golden Text, Psa. cxiv., 30—Memory Verses, 13, 14—Commentary on the Day's Lesson.

I. Mordecai and Esther (vs. 10-14). Mordecai learned of this terrible decree and sent word to Queen Esther and asked her to intercede with the king for the preservation of her race. 10. "Hatach." An officer appointed to wait on the queen. 11. "All—do know," etc. It was a universal rule, known by all. The object of this law was to maintain both the dignity and safety of the king. "Golden sceptre." Persian monarchs are always represented as holding a long tapering staff in the right hand. "Have not been called." She therefore had just cause to fear that the king's affections were alienated from her, "and that neither her person or her petition would be acceptable to him." Oriental monarchs were fickle and despotic. In attempting to save her people the queen must risk everything. The ardor for the king had for the time cooled toward Esther, and she feared she had lost her influence with the monarch, and if so how could she hope to influence him for the salvation of the despised Jews. We must not be surprised that Esther shrank from obeying the summons of Mordecai. She proved her heroism by deciding to go in unto the king, knowing as she did the danger to which she was exposed. Let us learn (1) that it is right to carefully estimate difficulties; (2) that we should never be discouraged because there are difficulties; (3) that those who go at the call of duty, in the face of difficulties, may expect divine support.

13. "Think not," etc. It seems that Esther had not been known as a Jew, but the fact would be brought to light and in the general slaughter she would perish with her people. 14. "Then will relief and deliverance arise" (R. V.)—Mordecai had strong faith that God would not allow the Jewish nation to be destroyed. "But thou," etc. You will not escape destruction, but you will lose an opportunity of saving your people. "Who knoweth." God may have put you in your present position that you might be the means of saving your people in this hour of darkness. It is a great blessing to have some work assigned us by God, and to see God's hand in our lives, accomplishing that work. This makes us strong, and renders life glorious, since it is a plan of the almighty and all-wise God. Several motives influenced Esther in this hazardous undertaking: 1. She was in danger. 2. Mordecai's words that deliverance would come from some other source and that she would lose the opportunity of saving her people. 3. The suggestion that God had brought her to her present position that she might be a deliverer in this terrible hour. 4. The assurance she had that God would give her success.

II. The three days' fast (vs. 15-17). 16. "Fast ye for Me." In My behalf. Fasting implies humiliation, repentance, consecration to God, faith in God, prayer to God. It was the expression, outwardly, of the intense desires of the heart. Only God could give success to her efforts. "Three days." It has been supposed that Esther could not have meant an absolute fast—complete abstinence from both food and drink—for so long a period as three days; but the time intended, from the evening of the first to the morning of the third day, need not have much exceeded thirty-six hours. "My maidens." They were probably either Jews or proselytes to that religion, and thus would be in sympathy with her. "If I perish." I will put forth every possible effort to save my people even though I perish in the attempt. The great danger to which Esther was exposed will be seen more clearly when we consider the despotic nature of Xerxes. When he was on his way to Greece he halted at Celaenae, a city of Phrygia, where he was entertained by Pythias with incredible magnificence. Pythias even offered to contribute some millions of dollars toward the expenses of the war. But when Pythias begged as a favor that of his five sons in the king's army, the eldest might be left with him in his old age, the brutal monarch went into a rage, and caused the son to be slain in the presence of his father, the body to be divided into two parts, and placed the one part on one side of the road, and the other on the other, and ordered the whole army to march between them. 17. "Mordecai went his way." He went (1) believing, (2) obeying, (3) praising.

III. Esther's success (vs. 1-3). 1. "The king sat." The position of the king was such that he could see all who came into the court.

2. "Saw Esther." As the king sat upon the throne, the two were face to face, though there was quite a distance between them. It was a critical moment, though Esther did not forget that "the heart of the king was in the hand of the Lord." "Touched.... sceptre." This was, no doubt, the usual way of accepting the king's favor. "As the sceptre was the ensign of the highest and most absolute authority in the king so the queen's touching it, or, as some say, kissing it, was a token of her subjection and thankfulness for his favor. Thus Esther's mission was so far successful. At this time she invited the king and Haman to a banquet, though the king doubtless understood that this was preliminary to a request of greater importance. The banquet was held: and yet Esther did not dare to present her real request. She simply asked her guests to come again the next day. Then follows Haman's downfall and death and Mordecai's elevation to power. The remaining chapters of the book of Esther tell us how the Jews were saved from destruction.

"It is," says the Florence (Ga.) Times, "much more comfortable, both to yourself and the rest of the world, to be a pleasant ass than an unpleasant bear." But why be either an ass or a bear?

OPERATIONS AVOIDED

Two Grateful Letters from Women Who Avoided Serious Operations.—Many Women Suffering from Like Conditions Will Be Interested.

When a physician tells a woman, suffering from ovarian or womb trouble, that an operation is necessary it, of course, frightens her.

The very thought of the operating table and the knife strikes terror to her heart. As one woman expressed it, when told by her physician that she must undergo an operation, she felt that her death knell had sounded.

Our hospitals are full of women who are there for ovarian or womb operations!

It is quite true that these troubles may reach a stage where an operation is the only resource, but such cases are much rarer than is generally supposed, because a great many women have been cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound after the doctors had said an operation must be performed. In fact, up to the point where the knife must be used to secure instant relief, this medicine is certain to help.

The strongest and most grateful statements possible to make come from women who, by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, have escaped serious operations.

Margrite Ryan, Treasurer of St. Andrew's Society, Hotel English, Indianapolis, Ind., writes of her cureas follows:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I cannot find words to express my thanks for the good Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound did me. The doctor said I could not get well unless I had an operation for ovarian and female troubles. I knew I could not stand the strain of an operation and made up my mind I would be an invalid for life. Hearing how Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound had saved other women from serious operations I decided to try it, and in less than four months I was entirely cured; and words fail to express my thankfulness."

Miss Margret Merkley of 275 3d Street, Milwaukee, Wis., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"Loss of strength, extreme nervousness, severe shooting pains through the pelvic organs, cramps, bearing down pains and extreme irritation compelled me to seek medical advice. The doctor, after making an examination, said that I had ovarian trouble and ulceration, and advised an operation as my only hope. To this I strongly objected—and I decided as a last resort to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"To my surprise the ulceration healed, all the bad symptoms disappeared, and I am once more strong, vigorous and well; and I cannot express my thanks for what it has done for me."

Ovarian and womb troubles are steadily on the increase among women—and before submitting to an operation every woman should try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and write Mrs. Pinkham at Lynn, Mass. for advice.

For thirty years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been curing the worst forms of female complaints, all ovarian troubles, inflammation, ulceration, falling and displacement of the womb, leucorrhœa, irregularities, indigestion and nervous prostration. Any woman who could read the many grateful letters on file in Mrs. Pinkham's office would be convinced of the efficiency of her advice and Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

FROM THE CAÑON SIDE

BY CHARLES TENNEY JACKSON.

THE aeronaut, Signor Da Costa, is a pleasant mannered man whose name, when he is on the ground, is very American, indeed. He has "done the parachute" 300 times. He is not averse to talking about his adventures, and he has left me quite at liberty to publish anything that I have heard from him.

He has had many accidents. He was unconscious last Fourth of July when they picked him up out of the Ohio River. He has come down on top of buildings and telegraph wires more times than he can remember, and once he was tangled in the parachute and enveloped in the balloon itself in the top of a big elm tree in Wisconsin, where he hung seventy-five feet from the ground for six hours before any one happened along to get him down. But he says the worst "fix" that he ever got into was in Southern Wyoming, in a little town in Green River Canon. And he tells the story this way.

It was the wildest and most savage looking country I ever saw—all bare dirt mountains and granite crags, and dusty greasewood valleys and deserts, with no trace of living green to make a man think he is in a civilized land. It is curious that when they irrigate those gray, arid valleys they turn into fertile fields and gardens, just like Ohio, where I was raised. That is the way it is in Green River Canon. The pretty little valley, with pale green willows along the sandy river, and the dark alfalfa fields lie between those lonesome hills and cliffs like a gem in a rock.

I went out there from Denver, on a good offer, to ascend during a September festival. The valley was about three miles wide, and I calculated that the wind was about right that afternoon to carry me over it and give me a fair jump into the alfalfa fields or on the sandbars. But you can never foretell the wind in Wyoming.

Well, this time I was to make a plain parachute leap without any cannon act or trapeze work, and I meant to make a side leap, as I always do. In the side leap the cord is fastened to the side of the balloon, and the weight of the man breaks it as he jumps off sidewise from the bar. This leap generally tips the balloon and lets the hot air out quickly, so that it will not drift far. The top of the parachute is always fastened to the balloon, to make it unfold right at the start.

I started to inflate the bag that day with more than the ordinary crowd of helpers close about, for an ascension is a great thing in that country; the Indians and Mexicans, and most of the cowboys, too, had never even seen a balloon before.

The bag grew bigger. When everything was ready I fixed myself on the bar, cast the lines off and shot up swiftly, enjoying the astonishment of the wild crowd. I drew myself up and executed a few fancy kicks in my scanty red costume. You would be surprised to find how you can hear every little sound when in a balloon in mid-air. You can hear voices and conversation distinctly at 2000 feet, and a shout comes up startlingly strong. There was silence for a while as I whirled up above them, and then I heard a deep voice say, as if in my ear:

"What's the fellow doing? Losing his clothes?"

I glanced round behind me, and saw with horror that the parachute was trailing loosely in the air behind the bag. The top rope had been cut or broken by some one in the crowd, and the thing was utterly useless in its upside down and disordered condition.

Now this was a terribly serious business. I always take the greatest care that the parachute is properly arranged, and I had taken care that time, but the mischief had been done at the last moment.

There was nothing to do except cling to the bar and take the chances of being killed when the air was cooled or exhausted and the balloon fell. It would come down with terrible velocity with my weight beneath it.

I glanced up at the big, swaying bag and at the murky, swirling, warm air in the mouth of it, and then I looked down. I was about 2000 feet up. The gray horizon seemed to be rising all about me, and the valley and ground below to be sinking like the bottom of a bowl.

The balloon struck a strong current of air when it reached 3000 feet, and I had to hold hard to the bar and the ropes. Instead of the breeze down the canon, which I had expected would carry me over the valley, I was in a directly opposite southwest wind, which was bowling me along very fast, right over the high rock walls of the canon. I could see the black shadows lying along the sunlit slopes at their feet. To the southeast Green River Canon lay with white and brown walls of rock rising from the gray valley of sagebush and cactus, with the river shining among white sand and green willows, until it disappeared among peaks and buttes. To the north there was nothing but a dreary wilderness of bald, low mountains.

I felt lost in that air, for I had never been in the mountains before, and the sight of all that savage scenery and the thought of the hundreds of miles of it seared me more in some way, than my real, immediate danger of being killed when the balloon should fall.

But the balloon kept buoyantly on to the northeast, acting in a most eccentric fashion, and I began to watch it with wonder. "Gray Wings," as I had christened it, was the best balloon I ever had, and held up wonderfully, but after a while I noticed a few little sunken wrinkles along its sides. Then I knew that it was no longer rising. A little later and it tugged and twisted, and then pitched half over, so that a large part of the heated air came out round me.

After that it started rapidly to settle, stringing upward where a little hot air held its crazy top erect. Then the great cloth floated out over me, and I found myself rising in an attitude of defense, as if I could throw off the suffocating folds that would smother me like a cat in a sack. I had a professional confidence that I might land safe if I could see what sort of ground I was to land on; there are a dozen tricks in this act.

The flying cloth was blowing riotously about me, and I felt myself plunging to death, when all in a moment the gale ceased, the dust veil flickered and I dashed into a great shadow. I saw before me the tremendous precipice of the canon wall, which I had missed by a few hundred feet.

With the balloon partly over me I was straining my eyes to see the bottom of the gorge, when there was a shriek of tearing cloth, a terrific shock. I was hurled against a smooth, bald slope of rock and then flung out, to turn round in the air with bump after bump against the rock wall. This bewildering motion and my bruises nearly took away my senses, and it was several minutes before I could realize that I had struck a portion of the canon wall, on which the balloon had caught, and that my life was saved for the present.

I struggled free from the tangled ropes and cloth and glanced down. Below me the rock fell in a perpendicular descent for at least 1000 feet, and at its base was a steep slope of sand, with massive boulders jutting out. Then the ground fell away to the sagebush carpeted valley and the river course. In two directions I saw the walls of the canon going down to the same kind of a footing, but they were some distance back of me and behind the crag where the balloon hung. I had lodged on a narrow promontory.

As soon as I understood this I resolved to crawl back to the main cliff and see what chances there were of scaling it, so I worked myself up by the wreckage until I was on top of the torn cloth, and there I saw a sight that made me sick with fear.

I stood on the very top of a great pinnacle of rock—one of those strange formations, so far as I know, that are found only in our Western deserts. There was no possible descent from it.

Between me and the real wall of the canon there was a gulf of 300 or 400 feet wide and at least 600 feet in depth, where the shadow of the walls made a blue gloom. Its top was not sixty feet across, and was largely covered by the wrecked balloon, which was flapping over the side and throwing fantastic shadows on the eastern wall that curved about me.

And how the wind did blow! It was this that made me do something. I crawled under a flapping part of the big cloth, for I was afraid that it would all be torn loose and sail down the gorge.

When the outer edge of the cloth would blow up and flap I caught glimpses of the dim blue walls of the canon miles away, with yellow patches of sunlight here and there, and I had to shut my eyes.

After what seemed hours I felt more composed and crawled out to take another look. The copper sun was already behind the nearest cliff, and the wind had then died quite away.

I looked down the gulf and at the walls, and then walked to the outer side of the pinnacle, where the towering rock had scarcely a projection for its entire distance. The parachute hung there, and without any idea in my mind I pulled it up and straightened it along the rock to see if it was injured.

Then, as I looked at the blue dusk of Green River Canon I thought, "Why not try to fix the parachute and drop into the gulf, and trust to luck to keep me from the wall and the rocks below."

Within 500 feet that parachute would open, if it would open at all. A night on that peak in the piercing cold would kill me. The next day would bring no rescue.

But would the parachute fly free? I gazed down the crag, and then boldly clambered over on the cordage of the balloon and hung above the canon. I thought the rock curved out slightly, but I could see no projection that might catch the canvas.

I cleared the balloon from the bald rock and stretched the parachute along its round side, carefully noting every rope and knot, and then I slipped inside the iron ring at the lower end. I walked back up the slope, took one long look at the murky distance of east and west and the faint stars above, and then ran and jumped high and far out over the canon.

I hurtled down through gloom, staring straight up at the sky through agonizing seconds.

Then I felt a flutter, then a jerk on one side, then a jerk on the other, and I was slowly dropping down through a calm, warm dusk, with the protecting wings above widespread.

Down, quietly as a feather, the parachute floated round the base of the pinnacle, until the earth came rising through the gloom. I struck a foot on the flinty slope, and went rolling, stumbling along, until I fell, twisted in the canvas, among the boulders.

I wandered among the rocks all night, trying to keep warm, and when the daylight came I nearly scared a sheep rancher to death with my red flannel tights and doublet.—Youth's Companion.

LINEN FADS AND FANCIES.

For breakfast cloths white or natural colored linen is edged with blue, pink or yellow borders. Small hemstitched napkins match these in color and design. With colored linens, hemstitching is preferred to fringed edges. Nouveau art patterns are being employed extensively for the colored borders, such as conventionalized buttercups, poppies, etc. On more expensive cloths enormous roses or fleur-de-lis, magnificently shaded, outline the table top or form an artistic cluster in the center.

In the realm of handwork on doilies and centerpieces Irish embroidery is the most serviceable and best able to withstand hard usage. This is simply a fine satin stitch which stands out very decidedly from the linen. Medium-sized round doilies, with centerpiece to match, have delicately scalloped and button-holed edges, inside of which are narrow borders of marguerites, shamrocks or similar minute designs

Doiley sets of Japanese and Chinese embroidery on Japanese grass linen are enjoying a tremendous vogue. Chrysanthemums or carnations, done both in white and dark blue mercerized cotton, decorate the sheer linen. One very striking set shows sapphire blue dragons in a network of blue vines. These sell as low as $6 and $10 a dozen.

The newest centerpiece show very little renaissance lace, except as in the example just mentioned in connection with hand embroidery. If a doily or table scarf has a border or renaissance lace, padded flower designs in colored silks are embroidered on the braid.—New York Press.

AN ARTISTIC LUNCHEON.

For a goldenrod and sumac luncheon, says Good Housekeeping, use a polished table (the darker the wood the better the effect) with a plentitude of doilies, large and small, embroidered in yellow. For a centrepiece use a tall, graceful vase filled with the goldenrod and resting on a circular mat of sumac leaves. This is easily formed by arranging the sumac leaves to converge to a common centre where the ends of the stems meet. At each corner of the table have low bowls filled with goldenrod resting on sumac mats, and at each cover carry out this design in miniature. Scarlet place cards, with name, date, and occasion in gilt lettering will be consistent. Small ruby tinted and gilt Bohemian dishes holding the relishes—consisting of orange straws, salted nuts, scarlet radishes, and yellow cream mints—can be scattered over the table, and will assist in carrying out the color effect, which should also be observed in the makeup of the menu, with due regard for food harmonies. The china service should also have a touch of scarlet and gold in the decorations. The following menu is suggested:

Mushmelon with salt and paprika
Clear tomato soup with egg balls
Lobster a la Newburg
Chicken croquettes with yellow Bechamel sauce.
Orange sherbet
Mayonnaise of tomatoes
Wafers Cheese
Cranberry water ice Golden cake
Coffee

RECIPES.

Snow Fritters—Beat one egg very light and add gradually a cup or half a pint of milk; into another bowl sift a cup and a half of flour; one-fourth of a teaspoonful of salt, and pour the milk and egg on the flour, stirring thoroughly to prevent lumps. Then add a large, tart apple which has been peeled, cut in quarters and chopped in small pieces. Last of all, fold in a large cupful of light, dry snow, which has freshly fallen. Drop the batter in small spoonfuls into a kettle of boiling hot fat, after rolling each spoonful into a little flour. Cook until brown, or for several minutes. Serve immediately with powdered sugar.

Potato Soup—Four large potatoes, one small onion in which six cloves have been stuck; piece of celery or celery salt; cook till potatoes fall to pieces; take out onion and celery and mash the potatoes fine; pour in boiling milk until consistency of thick cream; beat one egg and take tablespoonful of butter; strain soup into this, season, and stir well. Serve at once.

Lemon Marmalade—Slice twelve lemons and remove the pips; lay the sliced fruit for twelve hours, or till the next morning, in six or seven quarts of water, and boil this all gently together for two hours, and again let it stand till next day. Then weigh it, add an equal weight of sugar for each pound of pulp, and boil all together till clear and beginning to set, when it should be potted and tied down at once while hot.

Tomato Rarebit—A change from the ordinary Welsh rarebit if one is fond of the flavor of tomatoes, is tomato rarebit. Stew one cup of tomatoes, and when they have simmered for ten minutes, add one teaspoonful of finely chopped onion; let this cook for five minutes, and then add one cupful of cheese that has been cut into coarse pieces. Let the mixture cook until the cheese softens, then pour our hot slices of buttered toast. This may be cooked in a chafing dish on the table.

And could write herself A. B.;

Gentleman with Grievance—This auto breaks down every 10 minutes. Conscientious Dealer—What of it? Gentleman with Grievance—You said there were none better! Conscientious Dealer—There ain't!—Puck.

Mrs. Newlywed—Oh, Clarence, I can see a perfect reflection of my face way down there in the water. Mr. Newlywed—Are you sure it ain't a lobster pot you see? There's lots of 'em about here, you know.—Life.

Auntie—How smart you look this afternoon, dearie! Dolly (who has been forbidden to ask if she may stay to tea)—Well, you see, I put on this costume, so that if anybody did ask me to tea I could stop. (Conscience-stricken) I haven't asked, have I?—Punch.

"Is any one waiting on you?" finally asked the haughty saleslady, condescending at last to notice the shopping person. "I'm afraid not," replied the latter. "My husband was—I left him outside—but I'm afraid he's become disgusted and gone home."—Philadelphia Press.

Customer (handing over the money)—I want to be sure about it. Can you guarantee that this stuff will kill off the cockroaches? Druggist (wrapping up the bottle)—I guarantee it absolutely, ma'am—if you can get them to take it according to directions.—Chicago Tribune.

"The dime novels that we read in our youth have gone out of existence," said the man with iron-gray hair. "Yes," answered the man with the bald spot; "if you want that kind of reading now you've got to go to a regular book store and pay a dollar and a half for it."—Washington Star.

First Fond Mamma (whose hopes have lately been dashed)—Our heartiest congratulations on dear Violet's engagement, Mrs. Hookham." Second Fond Mamma (whose hopes have been realized)—Thank you. We are delighted. Capt. Norton is such a charming fellow. First Fond Mamma—Yes, and so self-sacrificing!—Punch.

"But, tell me," said the pretty girl, thoughtfully, "why is it you always send your poems to the editors by mail, instead of taking them down in person?" "Well, I'll tell you," responded she struggling hard. "When I send them by mail, I am likely to get a rejection." "Then, you should submit them in person." "No, then I would likely get an ejection."—Chicago Daily News.

The Helpless Rich.

"Isn't my check good in this bank?" asked the billionairess as she stood before the cashier's window, according to the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"It isn't good, ma'am until you sign it."

"O, bother! Didn't you notice I inclosed my calling card with it?"

"Yes, ma'am, but it is not the same thing."

"Such a nuisance; Then I suppose I can't get my money?"

"You can get it by signing the check."

"How can I? My secretary, who does all my signing, is away on her vacation."

REFORM IN PHILADELPHIA.

Machine Is Utterly Defeated. Unionism Triumphs in San Francisco.

Washington.—Election returns re ved by the Associated Press up to o'clock Wednesday morning show that the democrats have carried the ayoralty fight in New York city; the te ticket in Pennsylvania; the state ket in Virginia and the city ticket Louisville, while the republicans e made a clean sweep in Massa setts and Chicago and Cook county d have carried their tickets in New sey, Rhode Island, Nebraska and aryland.

In New York Hearst had a plurality the borough of Brooklyn of some 0,000, with fourteen election districts issing. The returns indicate Mc Clellan's re-election by several thou and plurality. Hearst has chance ded in the voting.

Bird S. Coler was elected borough esident of Brooklyn on municipal wnership ticket. The New York elec ion shows that municipal ownership ill be a considerable factor in the ity's politics.

In Ohio the result is still doubtful, hough the returns to a late hour indi ate the election of Pattison, the demo ratic candidate for governor. The uffrage amendment in Maryland was defeated overwhelmingly.

McClellan Has Plurality.

New York.—Returns at this hour are complete in Greater New York in the mayoralty contest with the exception of fifty-one election districts scattered through the city. The vote of these returns gives McClellan, democrat, 221,815; Hearst, municipal ownership, 218,657; Ivins, republican, 132,118, a plurality for McClellan of 3,158.

Returns to midnight indicated that George B. McClellan, democrat, was re-elected mayor of New York by between 3,000 and 4,000 plurality over W. R. Hearst, Municipal Ownership League, and that William T. Jerome, independent, is re-elected district attorney by about 8,000 over James W. Osborne, democrat.

Will Not Admit Defeat.

At midnight Mr. Hearst declined to admit his defeat and declared his intention to contest the election. At that time returns from 184 election districts had not been received. McClellan had 205,592; Hearst, 203,370, and Ivins 130,326 votes.

The following statement was issued at midnight by W. R. Hearst:

"We have won this election. All Tammany's friends; all Tammany's corruption; all Tammany's intimidation and violence; all Tammany's false registration, illegal voting and dishonest count, have not been able to overcome a great popular majority. The recount will show that we have won the election by many thousands of votes.

"I shall fight this battle to the end in behalf of the people who have cast their votes for me, and who shall not be disfranchised by any effort of criminal bosses.

"WILLIAM R. HEARST."

Boston, Mass.—Lieutenant Governo Curtis Guild, Jr., of Boston, the republican candidate, was elected governo of Massachusetts in the state election today by a plurality of 29,435 ove Gen. Charles W. Bartlett, of Bosto the democratic candidate.

While returns from only six of th forty-two wards in this city had be counted up to midnight on Tuesda enough is known of the result in t remaining wards to indicate the de feat of the republican local ticket from 60,000 to 75,000 plurality.

Boston, Mass.—Lieutenant Governor
Curtis Guild, Jr., of Boston, the republican candidate, was elected governor of Massachusetts in the state election today by a plurality of 29,435 over
Gen. Charles W. Bartlett, of Boston, the democratic candidate.
Philadelphia.—Philadelphia has been counted up to midnight on Tuesday, enough is known of the result in the remaining wards to indicate the defeat of the republican local ticket by from 60,000 to 75,000 plurality.

The victory of the city party carried with it the election of Wm. H. Berry, the democratic and reform candidate for state treasurer. J. Lee Plummer, the republican candidate for that office, was badly cut throughout the city and state, and he lost his own county, which is usually republican.
The result has every appearance of a landslide for reform, not only in Philadelphia, but throughout the state.
Columbus, O.—Ohio voters Tuesday chose a governor and various state officers, but at this hour it is impossible to give a positive statement of the winners, although the chances seem to favor John M. Pattison, democrat.
Only 440 of over 4,200 precincts in the state have been heard from, giving Herrick 55,000 and Pattison 53,399. In the big cities the democratic gains thus far average 108 per precinct, while the gain outside thesecities averages only 34 to the precinct. Estimating the remaining precincts at the ratio Battison will be nearly forty thousand short of the 230,000 republican plurality of last year, with which comparisons are made.
San Francisco.—For the third consecutive time Eugene E. Schmitz, the union labor candidate, was re-elected mayor by a majority of at least 15,000 over John S. Partridge, the joint nominee of the republican and democratic parties.
Returns from 314 precincts out of 320 give Schmitz 42,202; Partridge, 28,108. In addition to mayor, the union labor party has probably elected its entire municipal ticket by a majority ranging from 10,000 to 15,000. Voting machines were used for the first time in all the precincts.

Moore & Handley Burned.

Birmingham.—Fire which originated about 10 o'clock Tuesday night completely destroyed the five-story brick building of the Moore & Handley Hardware Company at Twentieth street and Avenue A, causing a loss of between $250,000 and $275,000.
A two-story building, part of which was formerly occupied by the Avondale Steam Laundry and part of which is occupied by the local branch of the Philip Carey Manufacturing company, was also destroyed, causing an additional loss of about $25,000. This building is on the north side of Avenue A, between Twentieth and Twenty-first streets.
The building on Avenue A was the property of Bryan, Lyn & Hass, and was valued at about $12,000, and practically covered by insurance. The stock of the Philip Carey Manufacturing company was valued at about $12,000, and was also practically covered by insurance.
The Moore & Handley building cost about $75,000, exclusive of the foundations, which were very deep and expensive. It was completed about two years ago, or a year after the fire which destroyed a portion of the plant of the company on October 7, 1902.
The origin of the fire is unknown. Two theories are advanced as to the cause. One is that a spark from a passing engine was blown through one of the windows and the other is that defective electic wiring was the cause.
The fire was one of those with which no fire department in the south could cope. The Birmingham department has no modern apparatus for throwing streams of water into the upper floors of such a building. The old extension truck was placed in front of the building and did effective work, but it required such a length of time to erect it that it was practically useless in preventing a spread of the fire.

Washes Faces of City Clocks.

From the New York Evening Post.
"I've been washing the faces of the city clocks nigh on to ten years, I guess," said a pleasant Scotch-Irish-American, "and before that I did it in the old country. There aren't many face washers in this land, and the few who know the business do well at it." He looked prosperous in his tweed suit and derby hat.
"Is your work anything like that of the steeple climber?" he was asked.
"Bless you, no," he replied with twinkling eyes, much amused. "Only in one thing, and that is that mostly sailors take up with the trade. That's because we're good climbers, you know. I've washed the faces of city and church clocks that were 180 feet from the ground and it took me two and three weeks to do it.
"I'm a practical clock repairer, too—have to be, you know—and do my work in a huge wooden cradle made for the purpose. Some clocks get their faces dirty in a year or so; others remain clean ten years, and so on. Old Ben, Westminster's great clock, is expected to keep clean fifteen years.
"In the old days the trade was more dangerous. We used to work from scaffolds, and got many dangerous falls. Now we have the cradle, and all the fixings and comforts, and if a man keeps his head he can work as well as on the curb. How is the pay? Well, that's hard to figure, for we work by the job. We don't clean clock faces in winter, so we make enough in the summer to last the year around. Of course, sometimes the clocks are taken out of their cases and repaired in the shops. Last year I cleared $2,000, and visited only two other cities, Chicago and Boston. This year I'll make more, because the building operations have grimed the clocks and given our trade a lift."

Libau, Russia.—Six armed men entered the Libau branch of the Moscow International Trade Bank and robbed 000 recovered. The sixth man with $7,500 escaped.

ALL RUSSIA REJOICES

Citizens Go Wild Over the Czar's Recent Grant.

LICENSE AFTER DESPOTISM

Troops Withdrawn From St. Petersburg Streets and Police Told to Let the People Give Vent to Their Feelings—Inflammatory Harangues Made to Enormous Crowds.

St. Petersburg, Russia.—The Russian capital blossomed out with flags and bunting. All the troops were withdrawn from the streets, and the city presented almost its normal appearance. The nervousness of the people has suddenly disappeared. Workmen by the thousands flocked back to the shops and factories, without awaiting the permission of the strike committee.
The authorities did all in their power to encourage the spirit of rejoicing over the newly granted liberties. It was by order of General Trepoff that the regulation decorations were hung out, the troops were withdrawn to their barracks, and the police were instructed to permit the people to vent their feelings.
Before noon the celebrations began, and the city soon appeared to have gone mad. Such scenes had never before been witnessed in Russia. Unrestrained by word or deed, the crowds did and said what they liked. Despotism seemed suddenly to have been replaced by license. Red flags were everywhere in evidence. In the churches devout men and women, on bended knees, rendered thanks for the blessings of liberty, while at the corners of the thronged streets orators harangued the populace.
The people assembled principally on the Nevsky Prospect. From the Kazan Cathedral to the Town Hall, opposite the Hotel de l'Europe, traffic was blocked. Fully 30,000 workmen were massed there, listening to student orators, who delivered impassioned speeches from the steps of th Town Hall and Cathedral. Red flags showed above the dense black mass of cheering humanity. The police kept in the background, not even trying to keep the street open. Passing patrols, on their way to the barracks, would have been mobbed had it not been for the appeals of the cool-headed, who declared, to the accompaniment of cheers, that the troops were henceforth with the people.

Monster Procession With Red Flags.

The biggest demonstration was organized by students and workmen. A great procession was formed. Starting from the university 10,000 strong, it increased in numbers as the demonstrators marched across the river and up the Nevsky Prospect as far as the Kazan Cathedral, singing the "Marseillaise." A dozen red banners inscribed with the word "Svoboda" (liberty), were carried at the head of the parade, which stopped at the places where the troops fired on the people January 22, and the paraders with bared heads chanted funeral dirges. The crowds in the streets uncovered their heads as the procession passed.
At the Kazan Cathedral the procession counter-marched to the university, where, from the balconies, students harangued the crowds with fiery speeches, urging the people not to cease the struggle until every right of man had been attained. In the midst of the oratory intense enthusiasm was created by a student who scaled the roof of the university and attached a red flag to the cross over the entrance.

PRINCE LOUIS IN AMERICA

British Ships Anchor With Our Fleet at Annapolis.

Reception to the Visiting Rear Admiral and His Officers and Men at Naval Academy.

Annapolis, Md.—Prince Louis of Battenberg and his fleet of crack British warships reached Annapolis. The Prince, his officers, and escort have set foot on American soil and have been made to feel at home. The fleet dropped anchor at 10.20 o'clock in the morning.
In the greeting which was extended to the representative of King Edward VII. there was an element of sincerity which, strictly adhering to regulations as the ceremonies were, was unmistakable. Rear Admiral Evans, commander of the North Atlantic fleet, down to the newest cadets, every one entered eagerly into the work of giving the visitors a "good time."
That night the British armored cruisers lay side by side with the picked battleships and cruisers of the American Navy, making the most brilliant spectacle ever seen in Annapolis Roads.
Annapolis in the evening was alive with British and American officers, and at the officers' club were many reunions, some between classmates, others between Americans and Britishers who have met before in other ports.
Twenty-one guns from the Drake, flagship of Prince Louis' squadron, had announced the approach of the visitors up the Chesapeake Bay in the morning, shortly after 9 o'clock. Sunshine poured on the leaden-colored sides as the vessels steamed swiftly in single column. There was just enough crispness in the air to make one know it was the sunshine of autumn and not of summer. A light breeze set every flag in motion and stirred the autumn foliage, which made a brilliant picture on the shore line.
Prince Louis stood on the bridge of his flagship at the front of the column and gazed on the scene with evident pleasure. Immediately ahead, stretched out across the bay to welcome him, was the mainstay of the American Navy, the eight battleships of the first and second divisions of the North Atlantic fleet. The ships were anchored in single column, 200 yards apart, the Maine at the head flying the pennant of Rear Admiral Evans. The Missouri, Kentucky, Kearsearge, Alabama, Illinois, Iowa and Massachusetts, in order, laying spotless white, their guns and brasses gleaming.
Three miles further toward the shore five smaller craft could be discerned from the bridge of the Drake. They were the destroyer flotilla, the Hopkins, MacDonough, Lawrence, Worden and Stewart. The background of this picture was formed by the massive granite buildings of the Naval Academy, the great white dome of the chapel, still under construction, rising high along the skyline.
The armored cruiser squadron, commanded by Rear Admiral Brownson, anchored shortly after noon outside the column of battleships.
As the Drake began firing the National salute, the American flag was hoisted at the main, its colors mingling prettily with those of the British flags. As the last shot rang out there boomed from the Maine, flagship of the American commander, the first gun of the return salute, and quickly an ensign was hoisted at the main. Then the Drake saluted Rear Admiral Evans with thirteen guns, and thirteen guns sent back compliments to the British Rear Admiral. A salute of thirteen guns next was exchanged between the Drake and the shore stations.
With little slackening of speed, the British squadron steamed past Admiral Evans' squadron to place about 600 yards inside and came to anchor in single column parallel with the American battleships.
Admiral Evans grasped the Prince's hand heartily as he came to the deck of the Maine and welcomed him in a graceful speech. From the Maine Prince Louis and his flag lieutenant went to the Alabama, flagship of Rear Admiral Davis. Then the Prince, accompanied by his flag lieutenant, started up the harbor for Annapolis to pay his respects to Admiral Sands and Governor Warfield. A company of marines, drawn up at the Naval Academy landing, rendered the prescribed salute.
In Governor Warfield's carriage the guest was taken to the Admiral's residence and then to the Governor's mansion. The Governor was waiting at the front door, and after the first official exchanges the visit was comfortably informal.

TWENTY-SIX MEN DROWNED.

Foundering of a Swedish Steamer and Russian Bark After Collision.

London, England.—The Swedish steamer Johan of 1724 tons, and the Russian bark Antares of 340 tons, both foundered recently in the North Sea after a collision. Twenty-six of the two crews were drowned. The captain and carpenter of the Johan were landed at Helsingborg by a German steamer, while the captain and cook of the Antares were landed at Stromness by a steam trawler, which picked them up soon after the collision.

Deficit is Lowered.

Federal Treasury figures, issued at Washington, D. C., show a deficit $7,000,000 less than that for the first four months of the last fiscal year.

VIENNA SUFFRAGE RIOT

Attack Made on Parade of Revolutionary Socialists.

EMPEROR TO GRANT DEMAND

Has Decided to Give the People Universal Suffrage, According to Report in the Austrian Capital—Police Sabre Eighty—Orators Use Fiery Language in Their Speeches.

Vienna, Austria.—Grave disorders, in which it is reported that eighty persons were injured, occurred at night as the result of a great Socialist meeting in behalf of universal suffrage. The orators used fiery language, declaring that millions of workers were ready to follow the Russian example. The crowds outside the hall were so great that traffic was stopped for three hours.
After further harangues outside the building the crowd marched through the streets shouting for revolution. Near the Hofburg the police forced the demonstrators to enter the side streets, causing numerous conflicts in which several persons were seriously injured, the wild scenes lasting half an hour. Later the turbulence was renewed in many parts of the city and many more persons were hurt.
It is alleged that the Socialists stoned the police, compelling them to draw their sabres, and it is said that the police acted with brutal violence. The masses resisted angrily and a cafe on Ringstrasse was almost demolished. There were no policemen among the injured.
This outbreak is believed to inaugurate a series of earnest demonstrations, the arrogant attitude of the police having incensed the labor party and determined them to press their demands at any price.
Orderly suffrage demonstrations took place at Gratz and Prague.

CLEARS JUDGE BAKER.

Charges Against Indiana Jurist Not Sustained in Investigation.

Washington, D. C.—United States Circuit Judge Francis E. Baker, of Indiana, will not be called upon to plead to an indictment charging him with violating the civil service law, which prohibits the collection of campaign assessments from Government employes.
This is the crux of a report submitted to the President by the Department of Justice, which has just concluded an investigation of the charges against Judge Baker.
Civil Service Commissioner Green charged in his recent official statement of the case that several clerks in the Postoffice at Goshen, Ind., had been urged by Judge Baker to subscribe to the Republican campaign fund three years ago.

WOMAN FALLS FROM BALLOON.

Clung to Ropes as Her Husband Ascended—Theory of Suicide.

Anderson, S. C.—Mrs. Maud Broadwick, of Cincinnati, Ohio, wife of Charles B. Broadwick, an aeronaut, fell from a balloon and was instantly killed. Mrs. Broadwick was an experienced balloonist. She gave the signal to cut the ropes when her husband made this ascension, and when the balloon shot into the air she was seen hanging to the ropes between the balloon and the parachute. When 250 feet in the air she dropped and was instantly killed.
About 1000 persons saw the tragedy. Suicide is hinted at, but her husband thinks it was an accident.

ART IN FURNISHINGS.

Sir Caspar Purdon Clarke, the new director of the Metropolitan Art Museum, is to be one of the lecturers in the School of Practical Art Decorating and Furnishing, which opened for its third season the other night at the West Side Young Men's Christian Association, No. 318 West Fifty-seventh street, New York City. Frank Alvah Parsons of Teachers College delivering the introductory lectures.

Course I will be devoted to the principles of color and form harmony. Course II will teach Renaissance period structure and decoration and present application. Course III embraces practical design and free-hand drawing. All the courses will be under the direct supervision of Mr. Parsons, assisted by Prof. A. D. F. Hamlin, of the School of Architecture, Columbia University; L. G. Monte, of Teachers College, and others.

What this school means to the young business man is illustrated by the New Haven interior decorator who gladly traveled 148 miles each lecture night, arriving home at 2 a. m., and never missed a lecture. What it means to the average shopper hardly needs comment. The increased knowledge of the clerk, his better taste, the greater value of his judgment, his artistic resources—all these are of importance to the woman with money to spend.

"As every one knows, it is the women who do most of the buying," said a memer of a large firm. "Educate their taste by showing and selling them really artistic and beautiful things, and we shall create in them a desire for still better (and, incidentally, more expensive) objects, and then the first thing we know they will come and buy those good (and expensive) things from us. And it all makes good for trade."

What it all means to the woman purchaser, the firm and the salesman is shown by a little incident which took place not long since in a Pennsylvania city.

A well-to-do customer came in. She was moving into a new house and wanted a long list of goods. She had heard of the school in practical art decorating and furnishing opened by the West Side branch of the New York Young Men's Christian Association, and as the salesman brought out his velours and satins she showed herself decidedly "difficult."

When they reached the point of matching wall papers and rugs it began to look as if she might take the list somewhere else to finish. Then she began to speak about the association's school in practical art—what a splendid thing it was for the customer who wanted help—who was in that painful now-which-would-you choose frame of mind. And then she wound up:

"I wish you had a man from that school here to help me with my rugs."

The clerk had been biding his time. Now was the moment for him to declare himself.

"I am very happy to be able to say that I am a graduate of that class," he said, "and if you want any help from me I shall be only too glad to give it."

And he sold the goods.

FRILLS AND FURBELOWS.

Heavy black applique bands and sheer cream insertions will give a delightful magpie effect. A clever idea is to alternate them. To insure a firm effect mount them on a paper foundation. Mitre them down the back to a trifle below the waist line Then allow the long ends to fall in the coat-tail effect. To form these tails there will be three bands of the black and two of the white in each. At the front there is the bolero effect.

Hats of one color, though often of different shades, will be much worn this autumn. Greens of different shades will be fashionable in both velvet and felt hats, and green for the woman with color and who has not blue eyes is, however, almost always a most unfortunate one. Gray-eyed women need not fear green, provided their complexions are of the proper sort, and there is no blue mixed with the gray. Green goes best, however, with brown and hazel eyes, especially the latter.

Marabou feathers are still to be worn, but not so much as formerly. Ostrich plumes, of course, will be much seen—they always are—and also bird of paradise feathers. Aigrette plumes are less seen, but it should be remembered that aigrette plumes are most expensive, and last but a short time, whereas ostrich plumes make a much greater showing for the money invested, and are comparatively durable, and even the wealthy woman does not despise economy. The favorite side for the applications of plumes and feathers, and also on plainer hats of wings, is the left, although in certain hats long plumes sweep from the back toward the front.—Rochester Post Express.

WOMAN'S FINANCIAL MIND.

"The reason women rarely make a success as financiers is that they have absolutely no conception of money in bulk," said a well known broker of this city, in discussing this question recently. "We have examples of it every day. We have a few women patrons, but we don't like them. I guess you'll find that chivalry dies out when it comes to a question of taking care of women's money for them.

"Men think of large sums of money in the abstract; women only in the concrete. If you tell a woman she will profit $10,000 in a certain deal she thinks you are honest and not trying to get ahead of her. If you tell her there's going to be a big coup of $100,000 or so she looks at you in childlike bewilderment. Her experience des not give her any clue to the possibilities of this sum of money. She does not realize how much tangible value it represents.

"'My! My! That seems an awful big sum of money,' said one particularly unsophisticated woman, who had made a successful deal through accident rather than design. 'Could I live comfortably on that for the rest of my life? How much would my income be a year, say, without touching the principal?'

"A woman is afraid to deal with money in large sums, unless she happens to be trained to it. She can't, in her mind's eye, see how many houses, or rents or school bills it will pay for. When she hears of a large sum of money she always wants to know how much it's going to buy her, how it is going to look in some concrete form like houses, or dresses, or trips abroad. As a simple quantity to figure interest on she can't realize it."—Philadelphia Record.

GIFTS FOR THE BABY.

Soft pillows of down, with hand-embroidered covers, are necessary for babies, whether they are sleeping, riding, in a cot or being coddled, and because they are in constant use some are not elaborate.

An oblong shape, on which an infant can rest at full length, is more desirable than a square or round one. Many are covered with a light-colored silk, over which there is a dotted white Swiss slip, with a lace trimmed ruffle, fulled on around the edges. In the four corners of the slip are clover-shaped medallions, and in the center the baby's monogram in big letter, says the New York Telegram.

Over a light shade of pink silk a sheer white linen slip adorned with tiny pink roses on delicate green vine makes a most attractive pillow, with a double valance around the side. A simpler way is to make the white slip in panels by using insertion. Through it run narrow baby ribbon to match the color of the pillow and tie the ends in dainty bows. To the edge of the ruffle sew narrow insertion, through which the baby ribbon is to be run and tied in double bowknots at each of the four corners. The pillows need not be covered with silk if that is too expensive, for a pretty shade of sateen will look quite as well under the sheer white slip.

COSTUME FOR STREET WEAR.

For street wear the costume on the tailor-made order, short skirt and medium length coat, will be correct, but only as a morning costume. For afternoon and reception wear a much more elaborate style is demanded, with long skirt and long coat of much more fanciful design. This style of long coat is, in fact, one of the marked features of the winter's fashions. It was seen last year, but did not become an accepted fashion, being thrust to one side by the craze for the plainer close-fitting model. The model is exhibited in velvet of a light shade. Gray is extremely smart this season, and when trimmed with lace and chinchilla, a velvet costume of this description must surely content the heart of the most enthusiastic devotee of dress. An overskirt effect is to be noticed in these coats that do not reach to the front of the underskirt, but at the back have a train like a skirt. This fashion will surely be modified into the length that clears the ground even in the most expensive materials.—Harper's Bazar.

SHAVING SOAP FOR WOMEN.

"I want a good skin soap," said the prety girl to the drug store clerk.

"I think you will find this most satisfactory," he said, handing her a cake.

"But this is shaving soap," she exclaimed indignantly.

"I know it, madam. But you said you wanted a good skin soap, and shaving soap is really the best complexion soap made. It is made for the one purpose of use on the face, and has in it the best of skin foods. Of course, you may buy a high-priced toilet soap with a beautiful paper wrapping and an exquisite scent, but if you really want to treat your complexion well, use shaving soap."—New York Press.

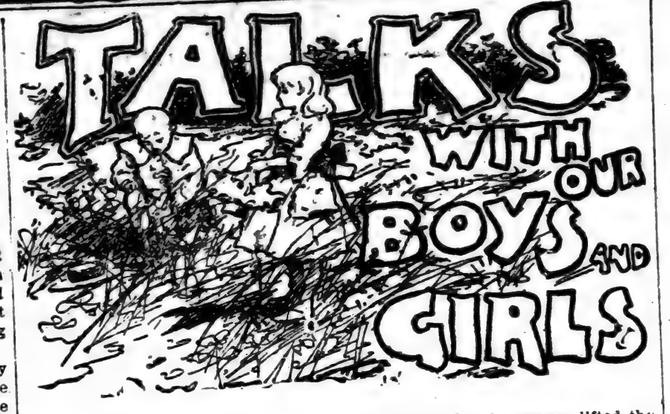
FASHION NOTES.

The day of the muslin dress is by no means over yet.

Kid gloves of a brilliant brick red are striking.

Belts of soft light colored kid with steel heads are lovely.

Little boleros of lace edged with fur are shown for street wear.



"ADD A STEP."

"O father! my sword is too short, I know!
And how can I win the day,
When, hand to hand, I must meet the foe
And keep him,—with this—at bay?"

"Say not, weak boy, that your sword is too short,
But add a step to its length!"
Was the Spartan father's stern retort
As he tested the young lad's strength.

Ah! many a time in the battle of life
When we murmur, disheartened and sad.
O'er our poor short swords, we might win in the strife,
Had we courage the "step to add!"
—E. E. Brown in St. Nicholas.

THE TALL, TALL LOAF.

Everybody was dodging first to the right, then to the left—and finally a man's hat was knocked off. The crowds streaming out of old Notre Dame rendered it difficult to approach nearer the excitable hands and heads, although it was plainly to be seen that a tall loaf of bread alternately disappearing and bobbing into view was the cause of the merriment. Hats were tilted sidewise, chins were tipped upward, people backed upon one another's heels, laughed, gesticulated, became angry, and laughed again. In the midst of this whirlpool of jostling humanity was a cleared space of goodly circumference, in the center of which I beheld a little American miss, carrying the tallest loaf of bread I ever saw. Had she been a little Parisian and used to such burdens, she would have known that to turn about in so great a throng means that the top end of that loaf would surely bump into somebody; that is, if she had carried it across her shoulder, as did Gladys. But she was plainly quite unconscious that she was causing a commotion; and thus it came to pass that this particular loaf of bread swung around like an over-sensitive wind-vane and distributed bumps north, east, south and west, in reckless prorusion. Of course everybody laughed, for all the victims were polite and good-natured, and besides, the "petite" excused herself so prettily in French that some of the most amused onlookers feigned to be hit when they actually were not. But when Gladys turned to ask pardon of a woman who clapped her hands to her hat, and cried "Oh!" the far end of the loaf would whirl in front of a Frenchman's eyes, and he would cry "Ah!" And when she wheeled about to ask pardon of this Frenchman who cried "Ah!" that same crusty end would swing perilously near as many hats and chins as it could possibly encounter in half a circle. Indeed, there is no telling how the "petite" ever would have caught up with her list of excuses had I not recognized my little countrywoman and rescued her and the bread from further difficulties.

"Oh, is it you? I am so glad!" was her hearty greeting. "And, oh, now I needn't go back home for Marie, for you will take her place, and go with me—won't you, please? It is only a little way from here?"

I cheerfully consented to serve as nurse and guardian for the "little way," and as we both hurried from the cathedral swarms toward the narrow streets on the other side of the river—and we hurried to keep warm, for it was an extremely cold morning—Gladys confided to me her secret, which up to that time she had not mentioned to any one.

It seems that, on the day before, a tiny French girl had posed in her father's studio and that after the child had left for her home Gladys inquired why it was that all little girls do not have round, plump, rosy cheeks like her own. For the first time Gladys learned that all little girls do not have the nourishing food which helps to make round, plump, rosy cheeks. This explanation set her little brain to thinking, and reminded her of a "tall, tall loaf" of bread which she had seen freshly displayed that very afternoon. It was in the window of a bakery just across the square from the great cathedral, and only three blocks distant from her father's studio. So the next morning she had started out and bought the "tall, tall loaf." It was while burdened with this great length of bread that I discovered her in front of Notre Dame, and then I carried the loaf for her to the dingy quarters we were soon entering. After a breathless climb up two dark flights of stairs, the little model who had posed on the previous day, responded to our knocking, and Gladys handed her the bread and said something in French to her mother, which I fancy must have referred to round, plump, rosy cheeks, for the woman lifted the corner of a shawl to her eyes as though wiping away tears.

It is a common sight in Paris to see working people carrying long loaves of bread, but this one that Gladys purchased was the longest I ever saw, and must certainly have measured six feet in length.

I thought of Gladys and her generous errand, that night as I looked from my own studio window across to the great snow-covered roof of Notre Dame gleaming cold under the wintry stars.—Meredith Nugent, in St. Nicholas.

LEGEND OF THE BLUEBIRD.

Long ago, when Jupiter, Apollo, Venus and all the mighty folk lived amid the clouds on mountain top, Jupiter got into the habit of coming down to the earth on visits to mankind. He always came when Juno, his wife, was busy or asleep, for she was not so fond of the society of the earth as he.

On one occasion Jupiter had an unusually pleasant time, but having stayed longer than he expected, and fearing the wrath of Juno, his wife, he was loath to return. So he lingered on, while the days and the weeks slipped by.

Finally it occured to Jupiter that a happy way to make peace and help himself out of the difficulty would be to send word to Juno, asking her to join him in the delightful grove where he tarried.

Mercury was the winged messenger of the gods, but as Jupiter had forgotten to bring him along he was now nowhere to be found. So Jupiter solicited the help of the birds. He ordered the first feathered creature he met to fly up to his home amid the clouds and bear his message to the Queen of Heaven and Earth.

The little bird was afraid of openly refusing to do the bidding of the mighty Jupiter, yet he had a wee wife off in an olive tree, who sat patiently on three wee eggs. How could his tiny lady get food if he should go on such a long journey?

So the bird only flew a little way and then came back and told Jupiter that Juno was asleep. Jupiter tried again and again with no better results. Each bird returned with no great signs of fatigue and with no satisfactory answer for the mighty god.

At last Jupiter called a plain little bird and sent him with the message to the Queen of Heaven and Earth. The bird flew straight up to the blue arch above him. Back and forth, back and forth, beat his tiny wings, and the bird grew very tired indeed. But it kept on until it was so fatigued that it was forced to poise and rest awhile. Then it pressed on again, until at last it passed through the blue sky and stood before Heaven's gate.

Instead of being fast asleep, as the other birds had said, there stood Juno, with a heart full of anxiety about the missing Jupiter. The little bird delivered its message, and Juno, glad that no harm had come to the long absent god, went to prepare for his visit.

The bird started back on its far journey with the news. When it came to Jupiter, it gasped the answer, then sank before him, exhausted, upon the earth.

"Most faithful of messengers!" cried Jupiter, "I know that you have really seen the queen, for you have taken on the color of the sky as you passed through!"

Sure enough, excent on his breast, which was brown where the bird had sunk upon the earth, its feathers had changed to a beautiful crimson blue.

"I decree," said Jupiter, "that all your children and your children's children, shall inherit the color you now wear, so that they shall not only be a delight to the eye of mankind, but forever prove the faithfulness of their forefather, the messenger of Jove."—B. K. Tourison, in the Philadelphia Record.

HOW CROCODILES ARE CAUGHT.

In some parts of India the natives dig a crocodile pit which they cover with sticks and leaves. The pit surrounds a little island or a mound of earth and is close to a stream where crocodiles abound. On this mound they fasten a young goat, and its bleatings through the night attract the crocodiles who break the frail floor of sticks with their heavy bodies and fall into the pit prepared for them.

A DESIRE

BY MARGARET

The gate was open and white clad woman lingered

It was very still; hardly a leaf red; the air was hot and heavy e man at the open gate paused be e entering and drew the gate shut e woman turned at the sound and d the man. A look of swee sition flashed between them, but for e reason it was not openly knowledged by either. Then there med a strained silence, broken at t by the woman's voice, soft, low d vibrant, truly a voice none could er and not heed.

"You are seeking the Prospects perhaps?" she asked slowly

"Yes—yes—" he hesitated.

"I am indeed sorry, but they are in Europe for the summer, we—we—that is"—her voice sank—"I have ta-en the house for the season; is there ything I can do for you?"

"Why, no, nothing, I think," he answered very slowly.

"You are stopping near here?" she asked suddenly.

"My place is over on the beach road, a mile east of here."

"Ah, then we are neighbors!"

"Yes; perhaps I may have the pleasure of calling some time? Or—I've a car that I will be happy to place at your service."

"I thought this country too hilly for autos, so we—that is, I have only a team and a modest runabout. You see, I am seeking rest and absolute quiet, and I am so sorry, but I fear that I will have little inclination to receive callers, but I am grateful. And now you will pardon me?" She waited for him to turn and go and this he started to do without a word.

At the gate he stopped and wheeled round, a look of determination came into his face and the woman knew instantly the situation that she would undoubtedly have to cope with, and a fear trembled in her heart, but she met his eyes without a visible sign.

"Is he here or when do you expect him?" he asked fiercely.

"I beg your pardon, sir. Please remember I am mistress here. I have nothing more to say," and she drew herself haughtily away.

"Has it gone this far? By heaven, Lotta, you must listen to me," he cried, leaping after her and grasping her arm tightly.

"Well," she demanded, quivering in every nerve; "well, what have you to say? Did you leave any other path open to me? Was there anything else to do? Say what you have to say and say it quickly."

"Why couldn't you be satisfied?
Wasn't the allowance enough?" he asked.

At these words spoken so close to her ears, the woman broke away from him and putting her hands to her throat she shrieked at him, her breast seemed the home of overmastering emotion.

The gate was open and in the long shaded path between wonderful borders of blooming roses, the form of a white clad woman lingered.

It was very still; hardly a leaf stirred; the air was hot and heavy. The man at the open gate paused before entering and drew the gate shut. The woman turned at the sound and saw the man. A look of swift recognition flashed between them, but for some reason it was not openly acknowledged by either. Then there followed a strained silence, broken at last by the woman's voice, soft, low and vibrant, truly a voice none could hear and not heed.

"You are seeking the Prospects perhaps?" she asked slowly.

"Yes—yes—" he hesitated.

"I am indeed sorry, but they are in Europe for the summer, we—we—that is"—her voice sank—"I have taken the house for the season; is there anything I can do for you?"

"Why, no, nothing, I think," he answered very slowly.

"You are stopping near here?" she asked suddenly.

"My place is over on the beach road, a mile east of here."

"Ah, then we are neighbors!"

"Yes; perhaps I may have the pleasure of calling some time? Or—I've a fear that I will be happy to place myself your service."

"I thought this country too hilly for autos, so we—that is, I have only a team and a modest runabout. You see, I am seeking rest and absolute quiet, and I am so sorry, but I fear that I will have little inclination to receive callers, but I am grateful. And now you will pardon me?" She waited for him to turn and go and this he started to do without a word.

At the gate he stopped and wheeled around, a look of determination came into his face and the woman knew instantly the situation that she would undoubtedly have to cope with, and a fear trembled in her heart, but she met his eyes without a visible sign.

"Is he here or when do you expect him?" he asked fiercely.

"I beg your pardon, sir. Please remember I am mistress here. I have nothing more to say," and she drew herself haughtily away.

"Has it gone this far? By heaven, Lotta, you must listen to me," he cried, leaping after her and grasping her arm tightly.

"Well," she demanded, quivering in every nerve; "well, what have you to say? Did you leave any other path open to me? Was there anything else to do? Say what you have to say and say it quickly."

"Why couldn't you be satisfied? Wasn't the allowance enough?" he asked.

At these words spoken so close to her ears, the woman broke away from him and putting her hands to her throat she shrieked at him, her breast seemed the home of overmastering emotion.

"Had you gone and left nothing at least the dream would have been mine. I looked for you, no one could take, but to be paid and deserted, to be brutally told that you had a duty to posterity, that you must marry and one in your own class! Is that wife of yours any purer than I was once? Is her love equal to mine? And now you come to preach to me, you—you—who have brought me to this. Do you think that I would touch your money? No, I have not fallen that low," her voice checked with passion.

"Lotta, dear little woman, I didn't get married. I found out my mistake and came back to you, but you went away. Come back to me, dear, do come, I love you. I found that out, too," he pleaded.

"Come—with—you? How — how?" and she held out her arms to him. "Do you mean that you will marry me—oh—" and she began to cry.

The man remained silent for a moment and when he spoke his tone was soft and hesitating.

"And the man at that house? If—he is not there—has not been there—but why speak of all this? I only want you, you, your own dear self—"

The woman stiffened and the tears died in her eyes, her lips formed a thin red line, her hands hung limply at her sides, all the life that throbbed but a moment before in her veins seemed to be gone, chilled and killed somehow at those few soft spoken words. There was an instant of strained silence and then the woman laughed.

"Go back to your little, narrow world of wealth!"

"You will come and see us some time?" she asked, gayly.

The man stood in amazement, too surprised to move, he could only stare and gasp, "Lotta, Lotta!"

"I prefer him," she laughed back at him; "he don't preach to me."

"Whatever has passed between you, dear, will make no difference," he began.

"Would you marry me in spite of anything?" she interrupted quickly.

"As for that—Lotta, come, be reasonable, dear;" he evaded her direct questioning eyes.

"There is and never has been any one but you and there never will be, but I no longer love you. I loved what I thought was you; I am here along with the mother of a man who has asked me to marry him; I told him of you, but he loves me, he forgives and forgets all things." Her strength suddenly deserted her. "Ah, that such a man as you are should live. You thought bad of me at once. Did I ever do anything bad in my life? I thought you loved me and you trapped me—but as He is witness, was I to blame? Go back to your little, narrow world of wealth, the world where women's hearts are but to be trampled on and crushed—go back and live!"

When the man recovered from his astonishment, he could just catch a glimpse of white down in the path that led to the vine-covered house. He stood for a moment in silence, then took himself off through the gate and out into the road. In the dusty distance he could see his auto and the impatient wife of whose existence Lotta was ignorant. Things looked bitter to the man, but manlike he cursed the woman for her lack of faith and her cruelty. The auto drew up and the wife stormed all the way home. But the man did not care much, his thoughts were all down in that beautiful garden with the other woman.

The Real Skipper.

The boat drifted on the clear lake. The man and the maid were silent and a little sad. Already the leaves were turning. Summer was drawing to a close.

"Dear," he breathed softly; "dear?"

She looked up, and blushed.

"Dear," he said, "will you float with me always—down the stream of life?"

"The same as now?" she whispered.

"The same as now," said he.

"I will. Gladly," cried the young girl.

He, you see, was rowing, doing all the hard work. She had the helm. She steered.

SEIZED THE JUDGE'S THOUGHT.

Lawyer's Display of Tact Secured Client's Acquittal.

At the American Bar association's banquet at Narragansett Hector Lawrence of Duluth said, apropos of tact:

"Tact often goes a great way in a case. I know a man who defended an old fellow charged with stealing an armful of wood.

"The judge was very deaf and had a habit of talking to himself. Sometimes unconsciously he talked to himself in a pretty loud tone.

"Now, in this case, when the prosecutor took the stand and identified his stolen wood with great positiveness, the judge asked himself in a louder key than he was aware of:

"'How can he identify this wood when one stick's as much like another stick as one egg is like another?'

"The tactful lawyer for the defense rose immediately.

"'Your honor,' he exclaimed passionately, 'how can this witness identify his wood so positively when one stick is as much like another stick as one egg is like another?'

"The judge turned to the jury with a great start.

"'Gentlemen,' he said, 'you will acquit the prisoner. That very thought flashed through my head not a moment before the words were spoken by the learned counsel for the defense. You will acquit the prisoner, gentlemen. I consider this a direct interposition of Providence.'"

Mr. Rockefeller Was Meek.

While Mr. and Mrs. William Rockefeller and daughter were automobiling through England and Scotland recently they stopped at Harrogate, taking a suite of nine rooms at the hotel. The day after Mr. Rockefeller arrived he went to the barber shop in the hotel to be shaved, his mustache having been clipped into the semblance of a scrubbing brush.

The barber proceeded to strop the razor and lather the oil magnate's face. At the same time, wishing to entertain his client, he remarked:

"We have the wealthiest man in the world staying here."

"Ah," said Mr. Rockefeller, "who is that?"

"Rockefeller, sir, the great oil king."

"But," said Mr. Rockefeller, "perhaps it is the rich man's brother, who is a very poor man. For instance, if your brothers were rich would it necessarily mean that you were?"

"No," said the barber, "but in this case I do not know which Rockefeller it is. Anyway, I should not want anything more than to have the 'rocks' this man has."

Mr. Rockefeller returned to his room, told his courier of the incident, and laughed heartily. All the smart people of the hotel were absurdly concerned in the doings of the Rockefellers.

Cableways in Brazil.

Freight cableways are used at Manaos, on the Amazon river, 1,000 miles from Para. The vessels discharge at floating landing stages some distance from the shore. Adjoining these stages is a steel pontoon carrying the head towers of three cableways of 550 feet span.

The tail towers are located between the warehouses on shore. The cableways are of the double-track type. The shore ends of the track cables are not made fast, but, passing over sheave wheels at the apex of the towers, are fastened to vertical counter weights of 10 tons sliding in guides on the far side of the tower. Both the endless and hoisting lines operating the motion of the carriage and the hoisting fall are operated by means of a motor in the base of the "head" tower on the float.—Engineering Record.

Reciprocity.

Mr. Rentall was annoyed with Mr. Shorter. It was not only that Mr. Shorter never paid his rent—though that was bad enough—but he was so extremely cool about it. Another Monday morning had come, and once more Mr. Shorter was "sorry, but he'd have to beg Mr. Rentall to excuse him for the time."

The long-suffering landlord's patience was at last worn out.

"Look here," he cried, "you're precious off-handed about it; but how on earth do you expect me to live if you don't pay your rent?"

Mr. Shorter smiled the surprised smile which cheers not but exasperates.

"That, my dear sir," he said, softly, "is, to my thinking, somewhat beside the point; the question is, rather, how do you expect me to live if I do?"—London Answers.

Plea for Shorter Hours.

President Mitchell of the Mine Workers' made an interesting statement in his Tamaqua speech, when he said: "I do not ask for the eight-hour day as a matter of sentiment, but as a matter of good citizenship. A man can do more work in eight hours than in ten hours. Do you know that in the soft coal regions more coal is produced per man in an eight-hour day than was produced in a ten-hour day?" Let's see, who was the lawyer who said that he could do a year's work in eleven months, but not in twelve?—Boston Globe.

Too Much of an Improvement.

They are thinking of paving Pleasant Lane, but the principal property holders claim that if they do pave the place the children will have no place to dig dirt, and the last man home will not be able to walk quiet so that the people may not hear him when he gets to his own door. We don't know, but we rather favor the present streets and sidewalks.—Pleasant Lane, Va., Journal.

GAS TO TAKE PLACE OF COAL.

Seems Likely to Come Into General Use on Shipboard.

If a vessel propelled by steam power is called a "steamer," should a vessel in which the motive power is gas be called a "gasser"? The query is prompted by the possibility that in the not far distant future marine propulsion will be largely effected by means of explosion engines, whose fuel will be gas generated on board. For stationary purposes plants of this description have already been erected on a large scale, and more than one firm of engineers is said to be engaged in perfecting a combined plant consisting of engine and gas generator which shall be lighter and occupy less space than the present combination of steam boilers and engine, power for power. The gas used is known as producer gas, and is to all intents and purposes steam or water vapor passed through incandescent coke in a special form of furnace. The resultant gas is a combination of carbon monoxide, hydrogen and nitrogen.

Utilizing the fuel in this manner is claimed to effect a very appreciable economy as compared with burning it under a boiler to generate steam. Indeed it has been estimated that one pound of fuel will thus go as far as three pounds in the latter method. This on a long voyage not only means the reduction of the coal bill, but also a corresponding increase in cargo space or passenger accommodation. It therefore behooves steamship companies to pause before adopting the steam turbine in a wholesale manner. —New York Herald.

What's in a Name?

At Montreal the advertising manager of the Canadian Pacific is a man named Ham, and the city ticket office is in charge of a man named Egg, says an exchange. The two are fast friends, and if both happen to be out of town at once inquiries for Ham and Eggs are frequent. By a coincidence both report to an official whose name is Bacon, whose chief clerk is named Brown. Recently Ham and Egg were both in Bacon's office. The telephone rang and Brown answered. He caught an inquiry for the Canadian Pacific office, and said:

"This is it."

"Who's this talking?" asked the voice.

"This is Brown. Do you want Bacon?"

"No; I don't want bacon, brown or any other way. I want one of the Canadian Pacific officials."

"Well, will Ham and Egg do? They are both here."

"I don't want any of them! Central, switch that cheap hash-house off this wire!"

Her Modest Wish.

Mrs. Clarence H. Mackay, the new member of the school board of Roslyn, L. I., made an informal little speech when her election was announced to her.

"I am glad to get this post," she said, "but I hope I am not selfishly, not greedily glad. There is no harm in our desiring reasonable, moderate things, but when we desire too much then we merit blame. Then—" here Mrs. Mackay smiled—"we are like a little child whom I talked to yesterday.

"This little child's birthday comes next week, and I said to her:

"'Do you want me to give you a birthday present?'

"'Yes,' she answered, 'I do.'

"'I'll give you a doll,' said I.

"'All right,' said she.

"'And what kind of a doll,' I asked, 'shall it be?'

"She thought a moment. Then she said, eagerly:

"'I think I'll take twins.

Of High Grade.

Bishop Vincent was praising at Chautauqua the Chautauquan architecture.

"Beautiful buildings," he said, "are a perennial delight and the architects who give us them should be more highly honored and rewarded than they are.

"Whenever I look at our superb buildings here I think of what their architect once said to me. He said that a bishop employed one of his brothers in the designing and erection of a fine house. When the house was completed the bishop was well pleased with it, but when the architect's bill was presented to him he was not so well pleased.

"'My good brother architect,' he said, 'don't you know that your prices are too high. The yearly salaries of many of my curates don't equal the amount of this bill of yours.'

"'Very likely not,' the architect replied, 'but I am not a curate but a bishop among architects.'"

You and I.

When first me wandered, you and I,
Oh! you and I, o'er fell and field,
There seemed a contest—earth and sky,
Which should the greater glory yield?

Earth showed so fair, her thousand things
Of beauty born, of loveliest hue;
While little clouds, like angel-wings,
Came flitting o'er the boundless blue.

Then, as we gazed, the picture moved Toward us; and the perfect grew
To yet more perfect; and it loved,
The picture loved us, me and you.

Now all is altered: faded, dim,
The carmine tints are turned to grey;
While winter, like a gaoler grim,
With iron hand shuts in the day.

Yet still we wander, you and I,
With spirits free, not winter-bound;
To us the sun is still on high,
And garlands blossom underground.

Earth is but sleeping; all is there,
Her fruit, her flowers, in long array;
Her robe of state, and jewels rare,
To wait her coronation day.

For suns may rise, and suns may set,
And summer leaves lie tempest-strown;
But you and I can ne'er forget
The glories we have loved and known.
—A. G. B. in the London Spectator.

Real Son of the American Revolution

James M. Edwards of Toledo, Ohio, Has Unqualified Right to Bear That Proud Title—Son of a Minute Man.

To be one of about fifteen of the surviving Sons of the American Revolution and to be the only surviving son of a participator in the historic battle of Lexington is the proud distinction borne by Jas. M. Edwards of Toledo, Ohio. Mr. Edwards is in his ninety-second year, and lives with his son. The fact that he is the only surviving son is not to be wondered at when we consider that peace has been declared for more than 120 years. According to the roster of the Sons of the American Revolution prepared early in 1904 there were then twenty-one surviving sons. But since that time it is known that six at least have died.

J. M. Edwards is the son of Ebenezer Edwards, who was a minute man from Acton, Mass., and who fired one of the first guns in defense of Concord road and stood by Capt. Davis when he was struck down by the first English gun fired in the revolutionary struggle. Ebenezer Edwards was born in 1757 in Acton, and was a carpenter by trade. At the age of 18 he ran away and enlisted. He was finally transferred to Fort Dorchester, where he spent some time. After three years of service he received an honorable discharge and went to the Green Hills of New Hampshire. There he married Lydia Wheeler, and by her had eleven children, all of whom are dead. He married Mary Flint in 1801, and by her he had four children, the youngest being James M., who is the sole survivor. Ebenezer died in 1826.

James M. Edwards was born Dec. 27, 1814, and was married to Elizabeth Moffitt of Cambridge March 6, 1854; they recently celebrated their fifty-first anniversary together. Four children blessed this union, all of whom are living. They are Frank M., an attorney in Boston; Herbert, a professional man of Toledo, Ohio; Elizabeth of St. Paul and Mrs. Augusta Seers of Chico, Cal. Mr. Edwards was first a banker in Boston a number of years, and later was in the wholesale lumber business in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Rapid Growth of World's Great Cities

United States the Only Country that Can Boast of Three Containing Over One Million Inhabitants.

There are now in the world nine cities of more than one million inhabitants each. Three of these—namely, New York, Chicago and Philadelphia—are cities of that new world which was only dreamed of 500 years ago and was undreamed of when Thebes, Babylon and Nineveh vaunted themselves as important centers of civilization. No other nation than the United States has more than one of these big towns, the other being London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Canton and Tokio. The new census will probably show a population in New York city of close upon 4,000,000 inhabitants. The unrevised figure is 3,987,696. This is a gain of over 100,000 a year since 1900, when the first enumeration after the consolidation of New York and Brooklyn showed a population in Greater New York of 3,437,000. London has a population at present of 4,536,641. New York is thus a close second, and in all probability will overtake and pass London within another generation. The contention that this is improbable because the metropolitan area of London includes 6,581,372 inhabitants, is unfounded, because it must be remembered that the actual urban district of New York city includes Jersey City, Hoboken, Newark, Elizabeth, Paterson and Yonkers, which are not comprehended in the municipal corporation of New York city. For ten years past the opinion has been gaining ground that the rapid growth of great cities in the nineteenth century will not continue throughout the twentieth. The new developments already achieved and to be expected in the utilization of electricity are undoubtedly to make life relatively comfortable in the country and in the suburban villages. The trolley car and the telephone wonderfully extend the area within which the man whose business is in the city may choose his residence. Electricity is increasing also the possibility of conducting manufacturing operations in relatively isolated spots.

His Proposal Made in Original Manner

Girl of His Heart Helped Out Bashful Youth to Some Purpose—Just a Hint and the Rest Was Easy.

My girl and I had been keeping company for two years, and at last I realized that something definite must be done. I carefully prepared—in office hours—various short and pithy speeches, but, strange to say, when I came into the presence of my sweetheart, they seemed to melt away, and so I decided to put the proposal off till next time. Thus it went on for another six months.

My sweetheart now—as it seemed to me—began to look at me in a reproachful manner, and I became desperate. I suddenly hit upon the plan of lending her two books to read, one of which was "How to be Happy, Though Married. She returned them in a fortnight, and said, with a beautiful smile, that she liked them very much. I thought this was a good beginning, and my heart beat high with hope.

Next week I lent her another carefully selected book in which the heroin's name was Jennie. This was also my sweetheart's name. Before doing so I had previously read the book, and on different pages I had underlined certain words, which words when placed together would read thus: "Jennie, I love you dearly. Will you be my wife?"

During the next fornight Jennie said nothing, and I feared she had not tumbled to the situation. But I was mistaken. She returned the book with verbal expressions of gratitude and delight, but never another word.

On reaching home I opened the book, and behold! I saw tucked in at the first page an advertisement with the following heading.

"You get the girl, we do the rest. How to furnish a small house for $435. Apply for catalogue to—"

After this the rest was easy. I immediately got a catalouge, and, when we met on the following Thursday, we had a good laugh, went through the catalogue, and fixed the matter up right away.—New York Weekly.

In Little Danger of Becoming Toper

Woman Drank Beer on Advice of Physician, but Brewery Would Not Get Rich on Her Custom.

"Speaking of homeopathy," said the doctor, "reminds me of the case of Miss N——. To appreciate the circumstances you must know that Miss N—— traces her ancestry back through a long line to the Puritans, and has imbibed from them strong and unyielding principles, particularly as regards saloons and liquor.

"For some time," the doctor continued, "Miss N—— has been troubled with insomnia, and has tried various forms of exercise and all sorts of remedies. Finally, she told me of her trouble. Perhaps you can imagine her horror when I suggested that beer might help her to woo sleep, and even went so far as to insist that it would do her good to take it several times a day. After a time, however, she decided to try my prescription.

"Then it took her a week to brace her courage up to the point of ordering the beer and having it delivered at the house in full view of the neighbors. She discounted public opinion in a measure, however, by consulting with the aforesaid neighbors as to her intention, so that the whole block was thoroughly posted when at last a beer peddler stopped at her door and left a dozen bottles.

"The beer man thought he had struck a new center for business and returned in about three days for the empty bottles.

"'My dear man,' said Miss N——, 'the bottles are not yet empty.'

"The beer man waited several days more and again appeared.

"'Your bottles are perfectly safe,' Miss N—— told him, and then a thought struck her, 'but if you need them I have one nearly empty which you may have.'

"'I guess you don't drink it very fast,' suggested the man.

"'Why,' replied Miss N——, 'I take two teaspoonfuls twice a day.'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

When Cleopatra Lived and Reigned

"Along the Yellow Nile, with Heavy Eyelids, Purple-Veined and Love-Compelling Smile."

When Cleopatra lived and reigned
Along the yellow Nile,
With heavy eyelids, purple-veined,
And Love-compelling smile,
The lotus buds that graced her hair
Than she were not more fair.

Her barge, that went with silken sails
Upon that tawny flood,
Was kissed by perfume-laden gales
And roses, red as blood,
Dropped crimson petals in the stream
From every gilded beam.

The palms flung down their cooling shade,
All stately and serene,
The tawny ripples lightly played,
Enamored of the queen,
Who lolled upon the deck and shamed
The haughty sun that flamed.

The languid air was like a kiss
On lips enchained in sleep,
A languor full of heavy bliss
Around the barge a-sweep,
And art and nature were in tune
And all the world was noon.

And when the night began to surge
Along Egyptian skies,
The silken barge to urge
Beneath the twinkling eyes
That gemmed the vaulted tent of blue
That Cleopatra knew.

But Cleopatra, where is she?
And where her barge of gold?
They both are but a memory
Of ancient days of old,
But still they swear the yellow Nile
Is haunted by her smile.

Mr. Wallace C. Edler,
Editor "The Union,"
Clanton, Ala.

Dear Sir—On reaching home I find our new catalogues are still in the hands of the printers, having been delayed by the printers' strike. It will probably be two or three weeks before we can get them and as soon as we get them will send you a copy, also any of our customers. Will you kindly advise any of them that you see of the delay. We have nearly enough orders to fill our car load of corn and oats and will undoubtedly have enough by the time the majority of them wanted them shipped, the last of December or the first of January.

Thanking you for past courtesies and trusting we may meet again in the near future, we are,

Yours very truly.

The above letter is published for the benefit of our people who had dealings with this concern. They are right about the "printers' strike." It assumed very large proportions in the north and west.

COTTON ASSOCIATION.

The S. C. A. met at Clanton court house Saturday and was called to order by President W. H. Conway, Secretary J. N. Dennis being absent, Tipton Mullins was appointed secretary pro tem. Pres. Conway called attention to the tabulated report of Nation S. C. A. which showed that Alabama had reduced her acreage 27 per cent and that the crop of this year was estimated that 1,054,948 bales as against 1,445,133 last year, and that the entire crop of the cotton states this year is estimated at 9,444,314 bales. L. H. Reynolds, W. H. Conway W. H. Killingsworth, J. W. Sorrells and others addressed the meeting on the "good of the order." On motion of Judge Reynolds, the President and Secretary were authorized to issue an address to the people in the interest of the association. J. D. Deason was appointed organized for beats 7 and 8. W. H. Killingsworth was appointed organizer for beat 2. Judge Reynolds offered the following resolution which was adopted: That all organizers of the S. C. A. for Chilton county retain half of the admittance fee, which is 25c for each member, and report at the next meeting, which is Dec. 9th. J. W. Sorrell reported and paid dues collected in beat 1 amounting to $4.36 to the secretary. The county papers were requested to publish these minutes and the meeting adjourned.

COUNTY COURT.

The regular session of the county court was held on Monday, Judge L. H. Reynolds presiding, W. M. Adams prosecuting solicitor. The docket was as follows: Joe Fulmer, selling liquor, waived to grand jury; Cliff Houston, petit larceny, waived to grand jury; Iver Husby, injury to animals, fined $10, case appealed; John Husby, injury to animals, nol prossed; John Gustin, abusive language, $5.00 fine; Cora Hooks, larceny, bond forfeited; B. G. Foshee, assault and battery, continued by state; W. R. Jarrett, abusive language and assault and battery, waived to grand jury.

COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

The court of county commissioners met Monday for the regular November term, and are busy settling the usual routine of county affairs. They will likely be in session the entire week, as Tax Commissioner VanDerveer has a lot of escaped tax cases to lay before the court. The increase in population and wealth of Chilton county is putting a good deal of work on our commissioners, compared with some years ago, and they are forced to devote much more time to county affairs. Commissioners Robinson, Conway, Glasscock and Kendrick are all present.

THORSBY.

Mr. Charlie Peterson spent several days in Shelby last week. Mr. and Mrs. Rud visited Birmingham during the fair days. The Ladies' Aid Society of the Union Protestant church met with Mrs. Horn on the 1st of the month. Mr. Foreman took a business trip to Birmingham on the 2d. Mr. W. C. Edler, our editor, was a visitor here on Saturday. The baseball boys and those who turned out on Saturday (were much disappointed in) to watch the game, were much disappointed in not having the Jemison ball team make its appearance. This is either the second or third time they failed to come. It's to bad their word can not be relied upon. Miss Ericson and the Misses Paulson did shopping in our county seat on the 4th. Our county surveyor, A. P. R. Dahl, was in town last week. A large audience attended the lecture given by Prof. Von Fielitz in the Swedish Lutheran church on Sunday night. Mrs. Michelson returned from a visit to Chicago on the 6th. Our mayor and our city clerk have been visitors in Clanton lately. Mr. Tipton Mullins spent Monday night in Thorsby. The Young Ladies' Sunshine Society met with Miss Alma Lefstad on Tuesday afternoon. Mr. James Bosworth, who is not enjoying perfect health, is visiting with his father. The Ladies' Auxliary met at the club rooms on Wednesday afternoon. The Swedish Ladies' Aid Society meets with Mrs. J. F. Peterson on Thursday afternoon.

NEMO.

CALERA.

Health of city is good. It's always good. Rev. Mr. Heard filled his regular appointment at the Baptist church Sunday, preaching an able sermon to an attentive congregation. Next Sunday Rev. Mr. Black will preach his last sermon for this conference year at the Methodist church. Cotton brought 10 1-2 cents here Monday. Calera has bought more of this staple this year than for several years. Green Whatley presented your correspondent with an ear of corn that measured full 12 inches in length, pretty good for upland. Eggs are worth 25 cents per dozen here and scarce at that. The attendance in our high school is about 70. Some few of our people have commenced fall gardens. Judge J. A. Campbell, a former resident of Calera, but now an inmate of the soldiers' home at Mountain Creek, is visiting friends here. The Vanderbilt hotel has changed hands. Mr. and Mrs. Brewer going to "The Boston" and I. N. Breazeel, Jr., and Prof. Glenn taking charge of "The Vanderbilt."

VETERAN.

MAPLESVILLE.

Mrs. Matthews is visiting her old home at Maplesville. Miss Florence Adair is in charge of our schol this season. Mrs. Glover has returned home from a lengthy visit to her daughter at Matthews, Ala. The cotton is about all gathered. J. E. Bearden has gathered 150 bushels of corn and 15 bales of cotton, all made with one plow. That shows what a farmer can do when he'll try. Martin Nix has decided to quit the railroad and live on his farm and improve his land. We are glad to have so good a citizen with us all the time.

The future historian of the United States will have abundantly interesting reading when he tackles the private cables which, within the last 60 days, passed between President Roosevelt, King Edward of England, the German Kaiser, President Loubet of the French Republic, the Czar and the Mikado. Some of these cables, it is stated, are of an exceedingly personal nature, but they show, it is aded, the persistence of President Roosevelt, accompanied by remarks as to sound financial and economic sense, and they display also, it is asserted, the kindliness of England's King and the helpfulness of the German Emperor and of the President of the French Republic. Incidentally, it is averred, continues the New York Sun, some of the cables give momentary evidences of testines on the part of the Czar and the Mikado. These private cables will be tucked away in the secret vaults of the State Department at Washington and will not see the light of day until all the great actors in the peace climax have gone to eternity and a future Bancroft is permitted to handle them.

It is officially estimated that there are 182,750,000 acres of standing timber in British Columbia.

THE GRIFFIN SNOWBALL

Strange History of an Appeal For a Sydney Hospital.

From London Truth.

A RECENT issue of the South Australian Register of Adelaide contains a long and instructive article on the history, present position and future prospects of the famous Griffin snowball letter. It is now nine or ten years since this "snowball" or "chain letter" was started.

It will be remembered that the thing originated in a small and insignificant local project to add a children's ward to a cottage hospital in a suburb of Sydney. On the committee was a gentleman named Griffin, who was a professional stamp dealer. In conjunction with his daughter he proposed to the committee that a chain letter should be started by his daughter, in her own name, for the collection of a million used penny stamps, and that he would add to the proceeds a certain sum sufficient to make up the sum required.

Something in the wording of the original—probably the reference to the need of a children's ward in a hospital—appealed to public sentiment, which was easily gratified by the fact that all that was asked for was ten old postage stamps and the repetition of the appeal by the recipient. The letter, therefore, at once spread like wildfire, passed from New South Wales into the other Australian colonies, to England, the United States, and to any number of foreign countries. I have myself seen copies of it in French, German and Spanish, among other languages, the Spanish version of it coming from South America; and the South Australian Register states that the replies have come in "almost every known language and dialect."

The original letter contained, in the usual form, an intimation that when the reduplication of the appeal reached a certain number—I believe it was eighty—it should be stopped; but, as always happens, this number was speedily altered through the thickheadedness of the copyists, who never seem to reflect that the mere reduplication of the letter to the eightieth "power" implies the dispatch and receipt of more letters than there are human beings in the world. In the same way, the address, and even the name, of Miss Griffin became mangled beyond recognition, and many letters are now in circulation directing the contribution of stamps to be sent to places and countries utterly remote from New South Wales.

As regards the results of all this letter writing and stamp collecting, the information given by the South Australian Register is most interesting. I have been under the impression myself that some time ago the New South Wales postoffice took the drastic step of stopping the delivery of the letters; but on this point I find that I have been misinformed. It turns out that the letters have been, and still are being, delivered, so far as is practicable. It seems, however, that Mr. and Miss Griffin themselves long since became tired of the labor and expense involved in merely opening the letters and sorting their contents, as well they might under the circumstances; and ever since 1902 Mr. Griffin has handed over his mails in bulk to the hospital. He says that he has thereby lost many private letters addressed to himself, which serves him right.

And what does the hospital do with these mountains of correspondence? It simply sells them in bulk to any buyer for what they will fetch. The present rate is 11s. per thousand. The secretary of the hospital is of the opinion that occasionally the buyers make a good thing out of it, for the simple reason that the letters now and then contain contributions in cash as well as in old stamps, and it has happened that a purchaser who has found money among the letters has been so conscientious as to return it to the hospital. Such cases, however, are, I should think, rare.

At any rate, the hospital evidently considers that the chance of finding an occasional postoffice order or check instead of stamps is too speculative to justify the expenditure it would have to incur in opening and sorting the letters. Between 1897 and 1902, when Mr. Griffin worked the thing himself, he paid over to the hospital £131. In 1902 the hospital sold letters to the value of £26, in 1903 it sold some 70,000 for £50 12s. 11d. and in 1904 the sales realized £20 8s. 4d. In about nine years, therefore, the total results of this monumental appeal to the charity civilized world were £287.

Bearing in mind (1) that this is very far from being the full market value of the contents of the letters; (2) that a great part of them cost the senders 2½d. each in postage, and the rest 1d. each, and (3) that many thousands of letters have never reached their destination at all, some idea may be obtained of the portentous waste which this idiotic scheme has involved from beginning to end. The postages alone would account for many thousands of pounds. For all this the hospital gets £237. Finally, to crown the absurdity of the whole thing, the children's ward, which was the object of the whole business, was provided long ago, the hospital having constructed a new men's ward, and appropriated the old one for the use of the children.

The snowball, however, is still rolling on, with apparently unabated energy, and it is likely to do so indefinitely.

Every year the English Mint issues over 8,000,000 copper coins.

SOUTHERN COTTON ASSOCIATION

Chilton Co. Sub-Division.

To Farmers, Landlords and Tenants:

At the meeting of the executive committee of the S. C. A. at Asheville, N. C., the assessment on every bale of cotton grown by members was placed at 3 cents.

At a meeting of the Chilton Co. association the county ex. committee was empowered to enforce this assessment.

The amount is small, and it is hoped that those even not members will co-operate in raising it.

The association has already added millions to the wealth of our country and the price of cotton would likely now rule at 8 cents but for it. The public ginneries are authorized to collect this 3 cents per bale.

THE FARMERS AND THE TRUSTS.

Of all producers the farmer is nit hardest by the Trusts. They catch him coming and going. And the Trust lives and grows because of railroad rebates, the "protective" tariff, and national bank control of our money system. Evidently the remedy is to cut off these special favors which build up and perpetuate the Trust.

Tom Watson's Magazine,

"the Magazine with a purpose back of it," was established to teach the best way of abolishing these special privileges, and, hence, of rendering the Trusts powerless to rob the public. It is a big monthly magazine of 128 pages, with illustrations, cartoons, Mr. Watson's brilliant editorials, special articles, a serial story, novelettes, short stories and poems, by the world's best writers. Regular price, $1.00 per year; 10 cents the copy, at all news stands. Every farmer is interested in knowing the best way to cure the Trust evil and how to bring it about. Now in its second volume, Tom Watson's Magazine is firmly established, and its circulation is growing rapidly; but we want to add a hundred thousand subscribers to our list in the next month or two.

Send Us Three Names.

of reading farmers in your neighborhood, together with this advertisement and 25 one-cent stamps—or a silver quarter securely wrapped—and we'll enroll you for a four months' trial trip subscription. Or five of you may club together, sending a dollar bill and 25 good names and addresses, and get five trial trip subscriptions. Learn how to clip the Trust's wings. Address
